A valuable lesson about tzedakah

As a rule, I don't think it's my place to tell you where, when or how to give tzedakah (charity). But rules are meant to broken.

Recently, The CJN received a letter from Emma Siegel, a 16-year-old from Thornhill, Ont. Emma's touching note informed us of a charity drive she and her friends have undertaken. Maybe it's best I let her fill you in.

"For seven years of my life, I have being going to Camp Gesher [a sleep-away camp near Cloyne, Ont., associated with the Habonim Dror movement], a place where I made friends that I'll keep forever," Emma wrote. "This year my group and I are supposed to be going to Israel… It's a chance to really understand our roots and meet other Jewish teens our age. Most of the people in my group who want to go on the trip have never even been to Israel before, me included.

"The problem is that the trip is very expensive, and many people from my group cannot afford it, including me.

"There's something my group never ever stands for: leaving someone behind. We're working together and crowd-funding… to raise money for those who can't afford the cost of the trip.

"We started doing this in the middle of February and had high hopes of raising enough money. We are now in the middle of April, and people are starting to give up and embrace the fact that they aren't going to be able to go. But I am absolutely not standing for that.

"These are the people who get me through the school year… These are the people I turn to when I need help of any sort, and vice versa. Now I want to repay the favour and show them the bright side that they always showed me.

"Even if the fundraiser doesn't end up reaching its goal, I would give my spot to someone else in a second, because this group of people deserves happiness more than anyone else. To me, if they're happy, I'm happy and I know that going to Israel would mean the world to them."

Camp Gesher's Machaneh Bonim Israel (MBI) is a five-week summer program in Israel for campers who have completed Grade 10. MBI comes with a hefty price tag: more than $7,000 per person. Emma and her camp friends have set up a website at www.buildingcampinisrael.com, which includes information on how to donate to their cause. They hope to raise $36,000 so at least 15 of them can go to Israel for the summer. But time is running out. MBI 2014 starts July 2.

These teens are living proof of the importance of Jewish camps in nurturing young Jewish souls. A summer in Israel might just seal a lifelong bond between them and their religion. And in the meantime, they are learning a valuable lesson about tzedakah through their fundraising campaign. That's worth getting behind.

So if you've got a few bucks to spare, you might consider spending it on this important initiative. If not, you can still contribute by spreading the word on Facebook and Twitter. Emma will thank you, and so will I. ■ — YONI

Egypt's Jews accept their fate

Mark Lavie

Two elderly ladies dressed in black, one behind large, dark sunglasses, sat quietly in the front row of chairs set up in the courtyard of Cairo's downtown synagogue.

The coffin of Carmen Weinstein, their leader for the last nine years, the force behind the tiny Jewish community of Cairo, had just been carried past them on its way to burial at the cemetery she had worked so hard to preserve.

The two old ladies, part of the community and symbols of its demise, appeared to realize what this meant. They spoke to no one, not even to each other. What could they say?

Their new leader had the courage to express what most people do not want to think about – more than 2,000 years of continuous Jewish life in Egypt is coming to an end. Magda Haroun herself is "only" 60, one of the youngest of the 40 or so remaining Jews of Egypt. No Egyptian Jewish men attended the funeral. There may not be any left in Cairo. Likewise, no children.

Where Carmen Weinstein's quest was to preserve Jewish life in Egypt dating back to the Bible, Magda Haroun stated a different goal.

"I promise to take care of you until God receives us," she told the two old ladies and the rest of the 200 people, almost all of them non-Jewish guests, seated in the courtyard, as she starkly acknowledged the dim future of this "unfortunately dying community."

The battle is over what will be left behind.

Carmen Weinstein, who died in her Cairo home at age 82 on April 13, 2013, was a fighter. She fought Egyptian governments to restore ancient synagogues and won. She fought for restoration of the ninth-century Bassatine Cemetery south of downtown and won that fight, too, until Egypt defeated her. Now the cemetery is overrun by seeping sewage, garbage and squatters.

Carrying Carmen Weinstein's coffin

Her mother is buried there, but years ago she stopped trying to take care of the grave...

Egypt overwhelmed her and her community and her cemetery. Most recently the population explosion, collapse of the economy and absence of effective government undermined her quest to preserve the place where Jews have been buried for 1,300 years.

But not even the cruellest of Egypt's often ruthless rulers over the last 20 centuries managed to defeat the Jews of Egypt the way that one modern leader did.

Gamal Abdel Nasser drove Egypt's Jews into exile in the 1950s. Part of the context was the creation of the State of Israel and Egypt's wars – its humiliating defeat at the hands of the new and poor Jewish state in 1949 and Israel's participation in the ill-conceived French and British attack aimed at restoring the Suez Canal to foreign control in 1956.

In a whirl of nationalist xenophobia, Nasser responded by expelling foreigners from Egypt. British, French, others – and 65,000 Jews. The difference was the Jews were Egyptians. They were there before Islam was born, long before modern Egypt was created.

Today there are Egyptians who mark the start of the slow but steady deterioration of their nation with Nasser's expulsion of the Jews. For 20 centuries, leaders of all persuasions had incorporated Jews into their governments and economies, and they benefited. Nasser threw them out, and the cosmopolitan, quasi-European cultural element of a crucial part of Egyptian society exited with them.

A few hundred, perhaps a few thousand, managed to stay behind despite Nasser, but not enough to form a critical mass. The yeshiva named for its teacher, the great twelfth-century Jewish scholar Moses Maimonides, the Rambam, deteriorated into a roofless ruin. The Ben Ezra synagogue, home of the unique Geniza repository, with its documents describing Jewish life in Egypt for more than 1,000 years, suffered from neglect.

And the cemetery, already in use for 300 years when Maimonides moved to Cairo from his native Spain, began to disappear under the weight of slums, thieves and unregulated urban sprawl.

Carmen Weinstein set out on a rearguard, last-ditch campaign to preserve Jewish heritage in Egypt. Though she never admitted it, the abrasive, aggressive yet cultured leader must have known that her quest was only to guard the physical remnants of a Jewish life that was slowly disappearing.

She had the synagogues and cemetery restored. She battled organizations of Egyptian Jews in the United States and France who wanted to "rescue" the sacred books and ornaments of the Egyptian Jewish community by taking them out of there. She adamantly refused.

Magda Haroun promised to carry on that battle, while admitting that it's a fight over things, not over life itself...

The message was clear to the two old ladies in the front row. It was clear to everyone.

It's over. ■

Holocaust must remain relevant

That contribution is becoming increasingly rare, as eyewitnesses to the most traumatic events of the last century grow older.

Of the 40,000 Jewish Holocaust survivors who came to Canada after the war, between 12,000 and 15,000 are still alive, says Carson Phillips, assistant director of the Holocaust centre.

As the malevolent chorus of Holocaust denial grows louder, the survivors feel an increasing urgency to bear witness to the horrors they endured.

"These children are very privileged," to have heard about the Holocaust first hand, Willinger says about the students he has just spoken to.

But everyone is well aware that these students are the last generation who will have that privilege.

Eli Rubinstein, national director of March of the Living Canada, has 20 survivors accompanying 800 high school students from across Canada this year on the arduous journey to Poland and then Israel. "Many of our survivors have passed away. We have a decade left of people who remember their stories. It's a very sad topic to talk about."

Their loss is immeasurable, Rubinstein says.

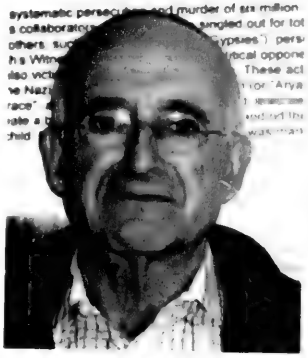
"Nothing is going to replace a survivor telling his or her story in a barracks in Auschwitz, saying, 'This is the last time I saw my mother.'"

Eyewitness testimony has played a central role in Holocaust education, says Adara Goldberg, education director of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre. The challenge now is to transition to telling their story without them.

One approach the Vancouver centre is exploring is to let its extensive collection of artifacts speak for themselves. A tiny recipe book, compiled secretly in a concentration camp, is among the items in their collection. The Jewish woman who created it has died, but the nephew she raised as her own child can speak about the book and the woman who risked her life to write it, Goldberg says.

At Toronto's Holocaust centre, staff are using the 50,000 testimonies, some of them Canadian, recorded by the U.S.-based Shoah Foundation. For the generation of digital natives at home with technology, "that's an automatic point of access," Phillips says.

Educators are also wrestling with how to convey the emotional impact of the Holocaust, that moment students instinctively grasp when they hear Gershon Willinger's profound sadness and his pride when he shows them pictures of his grandchildren.



Gershon Willinger LILA SARICK

"The Holocaust can never become the study of facts and figures. It needs to remain something that's relevant to our students' lives," says Daniel Held, executive director of Toronto's Henry and Julia Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education.

Increasingly, he says, schools are turning to Holocaust novels and memoirs to give students multiple perspectives of the war.

But students need to go beyond reading and listening to "snippets of testimony," Held says. "We need to look at the totality of their life, before and after the war. If we only look at a narrow slice of someone's experience, it's not the totality of who they were."

In Atlantic Canada, where few survivors settled to begin with, it has become increasingly difficult for survivors to travel to smaller communities for programs such as Yom Hashoah, says Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

This year, the council has commissioned a play about the St. Louis, the ship carrying Jewish refugees who were denied permission to land in Canada in 1939. A travelling exhibit about the ship has also been to smaller museums throughout the region.

Paradoxically, as the ranks of the survivor community dwindle, attendance at Yom Hashoah ceremonies and Holocaust Education Week is increasing, says Mira Goldfarb, executive director of Toronto's Holocaust centre.

There's a "recognition of this being an important moment in time, when we're on the precipice of losing survivors and we've engaged young people in the process of commemoration itself."

Toronto and other communities now include youth choirs and young people speaking and reading, as well as recognition of survivors and their rescuers.

"Nothing can replace the voice and presence of a survivor, nor should it. The challenge is to honour them with integrity and vigilance, and that's best done through education," Goldfarb says.

The city's Holocaust Education Week attracts 35,000 participants, and programs take place in churches and mosques as well as Jewish institutions. Ultimately, both Jews and non-Jews will continue to commemorate Yom Hashoah, "not only as a Jewish imperative but as a civic one, and that's why Holocaust education is key," she says.

Another approach to the void being left as survivors die is to embed Holocaust remembrance firmly into Jewish ritual. While Yom Hashoah ceremonies tend to be communal and secular in tone, there's a role for ritual and the synagogue as well, says Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

A decade ago, Alex Eisen, a Holocaust survivor who was a member of Rabbi Scheim's shul, proposed the idea of a megillah to be read annually, in much the same way Tisha b'Av is commemorated. With the co-operation of the Conservative movement in North America and Israel, a six-chapter book, titled The Shoah Scroll, was written in Hebrew and English.

"Historic events are remembered in Judaism only if they are anchored in religious rituals. The kindling of six torches by survivors in the courtyard of Yad Vashem is a meaningful ritual, but will it last when there are no survivors?" Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem asks in a foreword to the megillah.

Religious ritual still has a powerful attraction, even for Jews who define themselves as secular, Rabbi Scheim says. Witness the numbers who rarely enter a synagogue, but wouldn't miss a Yizkor service for a deceased parent.

The megillah may not become the defining ritual throughout the ages, but it is critical for Yom Hashoah to be commemorated as part of Jewish liturgy, Rabbi Scheim says. Ultimately, Yom Hashaoah must become a national day of mourning, when Jews feel it is disrespectful to go to a restaurant or to the movies, he says.

For his part, Gershon Willinger is confident that the Holocaust will be remembered, even in the absence of survivors such as himself.

"It's important that we focus on education after this is all over," Willinger said in an interview. "Very serious events in history are being remembered and taught... We don't forget about the Inquisition... and the destruction of the Temple. I would hope that we are teaching about the Holocaust.

"This is only the icing on the cake, that you have survivors speaking." ■

OPINION

Correspondent gives nuanced account of Arab Spring

Paul Michaels

Many CJN readers may still recall the distinctive bass voice of a reporter from Israel during the mid-1980s to almost 2000: "For CBC News, this is Mark Lavie in Jerusalem" as he typically concluded his stories, almost all of them for radio news.

Lavie, a name quite a few listeners assumed was of francophone origin, is in fact an American Orthodox Jew from Fort Wayne Ind., who made aliyah in the early 1970s, and, in addition to his journalism, often serves as a chazzan in his shul.

No one hearing his CBC broadcasts would have had a clue about his ethnicity. He was scrupulous about his craft as a reporter, always committed to impartiality and accuracy. When his time with the CBC concluded, Lavie moved to the Associated Press (AP), still in Jerusalem, where he became a senior editor.

Naturally inquisitive and adventurous, Lavie eventually decided that he needed a change of scenery. So he landed a spot in AP's Mideast regional desk in Cairo.

His timing could not have been more auspicious. He began his work in Egypt's bustling capital in 2009, a year before the "Arab Spring," ending his stint four years later at the time of its bitter collapse.

From that experience has emerged an immensely enjoyable and informative book, Broken Spring (Gefen Publishing House, Israel), available from Amazon as an ebook or paperback.

A 600-page academic tome about Egypt and the Arab Spring provides nowhere near the detail, intimacy and immediacy of Lavie's vivid, insightful observations captured in this fascinating 220-page book.

Each of the 40 brief chapters is an account of Lavie's experience in Cairo during this tumultuous, singular period in the history of Egypt and the Arab world.

After four decades of reporting from a region Lavie thought he knew well (he also reported outside Israel), he soon discovered just how much he still had to learn about living and working in Cairo.

To be sure, Lavie had long understood that common assumptions – the staple of many Mideast correspondents – including the notion the web-savvy, English-speaking youth of Tahrir Square were representative of Egyptian society, or that "resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the key to solving the region's problems," were false.

What he came to understand were the nuances and complexities of everyday life where half of the 80-plus million Egyptians live near the international poverty line of $2 dollars a day. That much is well known. What's less well understood but critical to grasp is that, "In Egypt's cash economy, only about 10 per cent of the people have bank accounts, much less checking accounts or credit cards… just about everybody pays cash for just about everything. So tax collection on transactions is nearly impossible."

In what may be a surprise, Lavie notes: "The vast majority of Egypt's 82 million people are happy if they have enough cash to provide food and shelter."

Yet, in another chapter, Lavie shows (in one of the book's many photos) a rickety, hand-turned 10-foot ferris wheel in a Cairo market where everyone, including the kids, appears glum under the strain of the Arab Spring rebellions. Lavie writes: "One overriding characteristic of the Egyptian people is their friendliness. Simply put: they smile a lot. They banter. They joke. They're comfortable, laid-back people who chat while they sip tea, help each other, display a positive attitude."

Yet, "It turns out there are limits."

Numerous other observations make for gripping reading: the widespread appeal in Egyptian society of anti-Israel conspiracy theories: "The wildest conspiracy theories blossomed, most with the Mossad at the centre. Food shortages? Internal conflicts? Scandals? Bribes? Just blame the Mossad."

Lavie's visit to Alexandria's beautiful but abandoned Eliahu HaNavi synagogue stands as a sorry reminder of the tragic loss of the once-thriving Jewish community of 40,000 with 17 synagogues.

For an accessible insight into life in one of the most populous countries in the Middle East, Lavie's nuanced, sensitive account of life today for Egyptians – and all it tells us about what we may expect in the years to come – is highly recommended. ■

Impact of the Shoah revisited after family discovery

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold

As the grandchild of a Holocaust survivor, I never heard the story of the murder of our family members directly from my grandfather – he never liked talking about it – but it was told and retold to me by my mother. She pursued graduate work in Holocaust studies, she lectured on the topic, she chaperoned hundreds of teenagers on visits to the camps and crematoria. So immersed was she in Holocaust literature that our bookshelves brimmed with the classics.

As for me, after all this exposure, I had somehow reverted to my grandfather's silence. Not that I wasn't willing to talk about it, but the fact was simply that the Shoah was a closed piece of my history, sealed and far away. The schools I attended did such a good job of Holocaust education, as did the summer camps – which would not let a Tisha b'Av go by without showing images of gas chambers or talking about the destruction of European Jewry – that I somehow felt saturated. I didn't need to talk about it anymore.

Until now. My second cousin received an email from a gentleman in Israel. He had heard there were members of a Chanowitz family (my mother's maiden name) in the United States. Since this man's mother was a Chanowitz, he thought perhaps we were distant relatives. He knew his mother was the only survivor of her entire family, which had included nine children. But perhaps this was a cousin through his mother's distant family.

He proceeded to tell his mother's lineage and all the details of the family. As my mother read me the original email over the phone, I was in shock. This man's mother, was none other than Asna Mera, who figured prominently in our family's story, the story I had heard so many times growing up.

Asna was the eldest sister of my grandfather's family. She was taken away in the first of the roundups, along with many of the leaders of the community. The story I had heard (and details are now being clarified) was that when the Jews had heard that there was danger, the entire Chanowitz family barricaded themselves in their home for protection. Suddenly, there was a knock on the door. Asna insisted that they should open the door despite the danger, because it could be a Jew in need of protection. And so the other family members barricaded themselves into the back of the house while Asna opened the door. It was a German soldier, who immediately took her away. Asna was shot and buried in a mass grave in the forest, along with the rest of the group. She was just a teenager when she was murdered.

And now, we hear that Asna actually had somehow escaped and had made a life for herself in the former Soviet Union, that Asna had children and grandchildren, a family. My family.

And suddenly my family's history, and my own, opened up again. Suddenly the tales of the Shoah were happening right here and right now. I felt the strange feeling of gaining family, of reviving the dead, of repairing a broken chain of my identity and of my family. It felt like a world reborn.

And then the realization hit: if this entire branch of my family could suddenly reappear, and could elicit such a feeling of rebirth and of hope, what of all the branches that never got to be? All the siblings who were, in fact, brutally murdered? Where are their descendants now? Where are all my dear cousins who should now be raising families of their own, as I am? And for the first time, I understood the loss. For the first time, I felt like a survivor.

The third generation is a strange place to be. It is the point where it is easy to step aside and allow the family story to be just that – a story rather than a living, breathing reality. For all these years, the Shoah was tucked away like a family heirloom. Now, it was suddenly dusted off and bequeathed to me, along with the loss and the void. It is my loss, too. ■

Leaders must be of strong moral character

Rabbi Jay Kelman

What is it about leaders that so many of them seem to be embroiled in ethical controversy? We in Ontario have a gas-plant scandal that won't go away, as new revelations come forward. Even sadder than the original waste of more than $1 billion of public money – and Jewish tradition teaches that it's next to impossible to properly atone for stealing from the public – are the repeated attempts at covering it up. Sadder still is that no charges will be brought against former premier Dalton McGuinty, and his successor may be able to avoid asking voters to pass judgment on whether she should be given a mandate to govern.

For all of his weaknesses, at least Toronto Mayor Rob Ford has not been involved in financial scandal and has a reputation as someone concerned about the public purse. Earlier this month, a former prime minister of Israel was convicted of bribery. The CEO of General Motors has been busy lately trying to figure out how and why the company failed to recall vehicles, even though it was aware of an ignition defect that caused at least 12 deaths.

As I was taught when studying Talmud, the simplest explanation is usually best. Money and power means more than the public welfare or even the lives of individuals. Of course, no one can or would admit to that, and if you were to talk to these same people one on one, you'd find that they don't believe it either, which explains why investigations are set up, often wasting more money, so that other explanations that avoid the obvious can be proffered. Admitting that money and power trumps morality is too painful and leads to cognitive dissonance.

Yet acting on our more noble beliefs is most difficult. The temptations are too high, the potential rewards are too great and the culture of entitlement and political deal-making too strong. I recall a most insightful comment by Robert Kaplan (my MP for many years) that people generally have great respect for individual politicians, but it's politicians in general whom they distrust and dislike.

Almost all who enter public service in all its many manifestations do so because they want to serve others and make a positive contribution to society. And I would say most do exactly that, working long hard hours often at less pay than they could earn elsewhere.

Yet these very same people often are the ones to perpetuate a system where doing what's right takes a back seat to doing what's expedient. They may feel playing by the system is the only way to accomplish other goals, and they may be right. Such is the sad reality of group dynamics. And if such is true regarding those who enter public service, it's likely even more so for those who enter the private sector, where there are philosophical debates as to whether there should even be any concerns other than making money.

As I write these words a week before Pesach, perhaps an insight (which I trust is valuable even after Pesach) into the "four children" is instructive. "When your child will ask you," which the Haggadah identifies as the question of the wise child, is written in the singular, whereas the question of the wicked child, "and when your children will say to you," is written in the plural. Wrongdoing thrives when one is part of a larger group, where each individual can evade responsibility. A collection of well-motivated individuals can fail miserably when working as a group. And it takes a rare individual who can stand up against the many.

Newton taught in physics that every action has an equal and opposite reaction, and we have a similar idea in the moral world. Those same qualities – ambition, intelligence, vision – that produce greatness are the very same ones that can produce moral failure. This is why the fundamental quality we must seek in our leaders is that of character. Considering the opportunities they have for moral failure – opportunities most others don't face – this is most crucial. These many, often anonymous, people can act in the best interest of others who are the true leaders of society. ■

Remembering Rivka by keeping up the sacred fight

Norma Baumel Joseph

We just finished celebrating Pesach, but my friend and colleague, Rivka Haut didn't live that long. How can she not be here when she taught so many of us about the transcendent Passover themes of liberty and justice? She fought for agunot and created vehicles for their liberation from the shackles of dead marriages. She was a teacher, mentor and adviser. She struggled to establish women's tfillah groups and she introduced us to prayer at the Kotel in the women's section.

It began for me with a laugh.

Rivka leaned over and suggested that we go to the Kotel on a Thursday to daven (pray,) and I just laughed. It was laughter filled with unexpected joy and a great deal of incredulity. (Was this what Sarah felt like?) As the days passed and plans developed, both feelings remained, but fear emerged. Could we really do it?

Never could we have imagined the long-term commitment we were about to make. Never could we have dreamed of the network of friendships and the layer of betrayals we were about to experience. But for me, the most astounding message was the realization the feminist community wasn't interested in us, and when they got interested, they misunderstood the issues completely. Even feminist Orthodox leaders have misconstrued the concerns.

In December 1988, for the first time, women prayed with Torah at the Kotel. It was a most incredible moment, to be the first women ever to pray together as a group b'kol (voice) with Torah at the Kotel. An emotional Rivka proclaimed: "We redeemed the Torah for women."

Later in 1989, we formed a legal entity in conjunction with our Israeli sisters to fight the government injunction that forbade us from going as a group with Torah, tallit and voice to the Kotel. Again another first: this was the first time Jewish women's rights as Jews were to be argued in a court of law – on religious grounds. At first, we didn't win. Then, in 2003, we won theoretically, but not practically, until the Sobell decision in 2013 confirmed our practice and said the police should not arrest the women, for they were not violating public order. The men were the violent ones.

Today, in order to appear to satisfy a growing public that seeks opportunities for diverse religious expression, the government of Israel is forging a deal that will change the nature of the Kotel. (In reality, they don't care about the diversity of Jews.) As I've written before, the compromise will allow services in a small area of an archeological site at Robinson's Arch. Some women representing themselves as Women of the Wall will agree to move there. Some of us who were with Rivka at the founding of Women of the Wall won't agree.

We fought for the right to pray at the holy heritage site called the Kotel, not some other distant place. We want to pray in the women's section, as is our custom. We've been doing so for 25 years. We are pluralist and respectful of our diverse approaches to Jewish prayer. We should be upheld as a model of group collaboration.

Robinson's Arch is not the Kotel. Just look at the map. It's the back of the bus – literally. It's not the sacred space carved out by generations of men and women who stood at that place and prayed. How dare they make it into a haredi shul? It's not that and never was.

We won the legal battle. Why should we step back from full acceptance of our presence? Why allow Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to make this deal and give in to the haredim? Why should Orthodoxy in Israel to be branded as haredi-only? If this agreement goes forward, the Kotel will belong to one segment of the Orthodox world only. The term Orthodox will belong to the haredi world only!

No one has the authority to surrender Jewish women's rights in the Ezrat Nashim. We won't agree. Women's rights aren't a bargaining chip that can be traded by politicians making deals. Israel is the guardian of religious holy sites and must assure freedom of access as confirmed in our court cases.

We will continue this sacred battle in Rivka's name. ■

Markham and Israeli firms partner to produce medical marijuana

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@cjnews.com

Back in the day, people who smoked marijuana did so to get high, but it turned out the cannabis plant possessed some beneficial side effects as well. It could reduce nausea, it was an anti-inflammatory, and it helped people suffering from spasticity.

The medicinal use of marijuana, or marihuana, has a pedigree that goes back thousands of years across a variety of cultures, from China to South America.

Although marijuana-use is illegal in Canada, there are exceptions. Permission has been granted for those with medical needs to grow their own or to hire someone to grow it for them.

The cultivation of cannabis became something of a cottage industry, a mom-and-pop-scale operation, but recently the government of Canada opened the doors wider to better serve the tens of thousands of patients who are helped by the substance and to control the quality of the product.

Enter MedReleaf, a Canadian corporation which operates a 55,000-square foot cannabis cultivation facility in Markham.

Inside the pristine facility, branches are clipped off a "mother plant," nourished for a short period and replanted in greenhouses where temperature, humidity and lighting are controlled. To enter the high tech grow op, you need to don a surgeon's gown and get daubed in alcohol, to prevent you transmitting any foreign substances that might taint the weed. "We're operating the facility at the level of sterility akin to a hospital operating room," said Neil Closner, CEO of MedReleaf.

Adding an interesting twist to the brand new enterprise – MedReleaf started growing its first plants in February and will make its first deliveries in June – is the involvement of an Israeli partner, Tikun Olam.

In fact, said Closner, six of the company's 12 varieties of marijuana originate in the Holy Land. The partnership along with the exclusive Canadian rights to the plants gives MedReleaf a leg up on its competition, said Closner. There are a dozen Canadian companies currently licensed by Health Canada to sell medical marijuana as of April 1, plus a host of small scale mom-and-pop operators who grow it for personal use or for a handful of others.

Tikun Olam has been operating for some time and has developed a unique expertise in tailoring varieties of marijuana for specific illnesses, said Closner.

For instance, its Avidekel variety is low in THC (tetrahydrocannabinol), the chemical agent that makes users high, but is loaded with CBD (cannabidiol), which is an anti-inflammatory. It works best with people suffering from conditions such as arthritis.

Another, Erez, has been shown to be effective for addressing nausea and is often dispensed to cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy.

Ma'ayan Weisberg, director of public relations and marketing for Tikun Olam, said the company grows its cannabis in a state of the art greenhouse near Safed, in Israel's north.

URJ Camp George director Jeff Rose

Camp George staffer identified as bone marrow match

CARA EDELL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two summers ago, as part of a North American initiative, Jewish camps were encouraged to hold bone marrow drives for people over the age of 18.

Last month, URJ Camp George director Jeff Rose was informed that one of his own staff members was identified as a match for a 62-year-old man suffering from myelodysplastic syndrome (MDS).

MDS is a disorder of the hematopoietic stem cell in the bone marrow. Patients with MDS can develop severe anemia and require blood transfusions. In some cases, the disease worsens and the patient develops low blood counts caused by progressive bone marrow failure.

"I was shocked and in awe of the power of our community," said Rose, after hearing the news. "I imagine that the feeling is akin to having won the lottery. I was so proud of our community for having supported this initiative in the first place and then to have found a donor amidst our young leaders is spectacular."

Rose said he likes to encourage his staff and camp community to take part in various tikkun olam projects. "This is a pillar of Reform Judaism and one of the values that we espouse throughout our camp program."

He said he invited the Gift of Life organization to Camp George to facilitate the bone marrow drive in 2012. He was told the names of participants would stay in the registry for a long time.

"It came as no surprise when the majority of our age-eligible staff lined up to do their part. Two years later, here we are."

The process at this point is anonymous, Rose said. "I have tried to get some information, but out of respect to the donor and family, we are not privy to too much information at this time. As I understand, the potential donor is currently being contacted to have the process explained to him or her. Following this, I believe there are a series of tests that will be performed to ensure viability of the donation. Once this is done, I am told that if all goes forward, I will receive an email after the transplant occurs."

Rose said tikkun olam projects are always interwoven into his camp's planning. Other examples of volunteer initiatives have included car washes to raise money for the local fire department, food drives on visitor's day to support the local food bank and camper performances at seniors' residences. ■

Action plan needed to address needs of First Nations: Paul Martin

When former prime minister Paul Martin visited the Leo Baeck Day School's south campus earlier this month, he told the students that it is up to their generation to right the wrongs that have been inflicted on Canada's First Nations people and pave a better future for all Canadians.

Martin chose to speak to the 250 middle school students from both of the Jewish day school campuses after he learned that the Union of Reform Judaism, with which Leo Baeck is affiliated, had passed a resolution focusing on addressing the plight of First Nations people in North America, said head of school Eric Petersiel.

"The resolution acknowledges our history as a Jewish People that suffered from discrimination, making it incumbent upon us to make the plight of the First Nations people in Canada a priority," Petersiel said.

In what was more of an informal conversation than a lecture, Martin engaged the students in a discussion about Canada's growing Aboriginal community.

"While First Nations are a minority, they are today the youngest and fastest growing segment of the Canadian population," Martin said.

"They are growing, right now, four times faster than other Canadians. And they are of your generation. There are more members of the First Nations and Métis under the age of 15 than any other segment of the Canadian population."

Martin said this growth will lead to a "fundamental shift" in Canadian society.

"My generation – and it was wrong for it to happen – but we ignored it. Your generation will not. These will be the young men and women you will be working with," he said.

"The only way that we are going to build a strong society is if we look at some things differently."

Martin acknowledged the failure of the government-funded residential schools where Aboriginal children were abused and marginalized in an effort to assimilate them.

"Imagine if you were taken away from your home and your parents were given no choice… You went to the school, you were not allowed to practise your religion, and you were not allowed to speak your language…

> They are growing, right now, four times faster than other Canadians. And they are of your generation. There are more members of the First Nations and Métis under the age of 15 than any other segment of the Canadian population.

And if you tried to speak your language, they would wash your mouth out with soap. That's what we did to the First Nations people for 150 years. And there are, today, literally thousands of people in this country who went to those schools," he said.

"That means that the entire time I was in primary school, secondary school, college, law school… we did all of this, and these residential schools were going on, and we paid no attention. We paid no attention, and the last school only closed in 1996."

He said that while the last residential school was closed in 1996, those schools were replaced with "a vastly inferior kind of education. That's why we need to go to an action plan."

He said promoting an action plan to address the needs of our aboriginal communities "is a responsibility of your parents to talk to you about it, but it is also your responsibility to talk to your parents about it. It's the responsibility of your teachers to talk to you about it."

Ignoring the growing Aboriginal community is no longer an option, Martin said, adding that in Saskatchewan, 45 per cent of all students going into Grade 1 next year are Aboriginal.

"I'm not going to be around when they are ready to take their place in this country. Who is going to be around when these students, who are now in Grade 8, who's going to be around in this country when they are twice the population they are now and when no one who lives in Toronto will not have met an indigenous Canadian? Your generation," Martin said.

"All of you have a tremendous opportunity to make this country a better country for your generation. Not for my generation, not for my parents' generation, but for your generation, and you owe it to yourself."■

Strengthening Jewish identity through environmental education

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish outdoor, food and environmental education (JOFEE) programs help develop Jewish leaders and foster a deeper connection to Jewish identity, a new report has found.

The Seeds of Opportunity report, released in early March, is the first national research study on the impact of JOFEE programs on Jewish identity, education and Jewish life for Jewish adults (specifically, programs that last four days or longer, such as weekend retreats or hands-on workshops).

The results? Jewish environmental programs foster a greater connection to Judaism, and allow alienated and disconnected Jews to reconnect to their Jewish roots while engaging in issues they're passionate about, such as sustainability and the environment.

The report also found that many participants and educators of JOFEE programs – about 70 per cent – consider themselves leaders in their communities.

While many Jewish organizations fight to attract young professionals, people often feel disconnected from the Jewish community. In fact, the report found that 63 per cent of respondents felt disconnected from Jewish life (the main reason was a negative experience with Jewish religion or community), but 32 per cent reported that a JOFEE program was the main reason they reconnected.

Based in Toronto, Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs is an example of a Jewish organization that's centered on sustainability and environmental education grounded in Jewish wisdom and practice. At its annual food conference, for example, speakers explored the Jewish year of shmittah (the year the land lies fallow) and what it means for environmental preservation. They also spoke about practising sustainable farming and whether kosher should also mean ethical.

"The beauty of Jewish environmental education is that it's a unifying aspect of Jewish tradition. No matter where you stand on the religious or political spectrum, very few people can disagree on the beauty and sacredness of nature. Especially today with the environment being a hot topic in general, everyone knows that it's essential to our life. And the very first job of the first humans (Adam and Eve) in the world was to watch over and care for their environment," said Tamar Maerim Yunger, interim executive director of Shoresh.

"Shoresh is the only Jewish organization in Toronto and Canada with a mission that focuses on food and environmental issues to build a more sustainable and connected Jewish community."

Shoresh's flagship program, its Kavanah Garden at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., embodies the organization's goals. Participants can go on a nature hike, read education signs in Hebrew or English, smell the spices in the Havdalah garden, visit the outdoor kitchen and learn about more than 100 varieties of fresh food.

The site was voted by Slingshot: A Resource Guide to Jewish Innovation as one of the 50 most inspiring and innovative Jewish programs in North America.

Most recently, Shoresh opened Bela Farm, which will become fully operational in 2016, in rural Ontario, where it runs educational programs and workshops based on Jewish principles of ecology, nature and tikkun olam (repairing the world).

"The hope is that it will create a more sustainable and healthy Jewish community," Yunger said. "Without a doubt, Jewish environmental programs are connecting and reconnecting Jewish young adults to their Judaism in a new, meaningful way, when otherwise they would have disconnected in some cases entirely or remained marginally involved." ■

Teen raises $11,000 by doing something sweet

sshefa@cjnews.com

He only just celebrated his bar mitzvah last week, but 13-year-old Zachary Winkler is a seasoned philanthropist, having raised $11,000 in his annual Do Something Sweet fundraiser.

Every November since he was six years old, Winkler has invited people to his Thornhill home for a street party to raise funds for the Hospital for Sick Children.

"We have a silent auction, balloon animals, face painting, cotton candy and inflatable games," Winkler said.

"We do it the first Sunday every November and every year we try to raise more money than we did the year before."

Winkler said that he was inspired to raise money for Sick Kids when he came across a newspaper article about a little girl who had a brain tumour.

"I didn't know who she was, but I asked if I could raise money and my parents said, 'sure,'" he recalled.

"I wanted to raise money in general and I asked my dad if there was a hospital for sick children, and he said, 'Yes, that's what it's called."

In its first year, Do Something Sweet pulled in $515, but every year the event has grown in size and scope.

"It started on my parents' driveway, but since the fourth or fifth year, we've also used our neighbours' driveways for the silent auction and the inflatable games," Winkler said, adding that this year, between 400-500 people turned out for the event and he surpassed his $10,000 goal by a little more than $1,000.

He explained that he came up with his $10,000 goal after having visited the Sick Kids website that has a kind of wish list for electronics and machines that the hospital needs.

"We saw that for $10,000, you could get a machine called a Snoezelen Therapy machine. It's for kids with autism mostly. It helps them relax and lights flash everywhere and it plays music."

Richard Winkler, Zachary's father, explained that the machine his son raised money for enables the kids to enjoy light, sound, and video imaging, to keep young patients distracted during medical procedures.

"Needless to say we are very proud of him. He is extremely humble about his initiative and to date he has raised just over $40,000," he said.

Winkler was also awarded the 2009 Ontario Junior Citizen of the Year Award for his fundraising efforts, and last year, Sick Kids named him the top individual fundraiser in the under-18 category.

"The hospital has just informed me that after tabulating all donations from kids events in the year 2013, he has just won this award from the hospital for the second consecutive year," his father said.

Winkler, who was inspired by his late grandfather who led by example by donating to many charities, said he has every intention of keeping his annual fundraiser going indefinitely.

"Generally, it's never good for a kid to be in the hospital and I think if you know someone who is, it's terrible and it's always good to help." ■

Boxers will fight to end cancer at upcoming gala

CARA EDELL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Mitch Krystantos, an active volunteer in the oncology unit at the Hospital for Sick Children, knows that beating cancer is not an easy battle.

After attending more funerals than weddings in the past year, he said he felt obligated to become even more involved in helping those who are suffering from the disease.

When Krystantos heard about Fight to End Cancer (FTEC), he immediately agreed to take part in the event.

Held on May 31 at the Old Mill Inn, FTEC will feature business leaders from across the city pitted against each other in boxing matches. The Las Vegas-style black-tie affair will also include a gourmet dinner and celebrity entertainment.

The third annual gala will raise funds for high-priority research at the Princess Margaret Cancer Centre as well as for What Are You Fighting For – a program that provides opportunities to exceptional youth in the community.

"I decided to get involved for many reasons, one of which was to see how far I could push myself," said Krystantos, vice-president of operations and marketing at Las Vegas Connexx.

"The main reason was to fight for those who have lost their battle to cancer and the ones who are still fighting. I want them to know that the fight will continue until a cure is found."

Krystantos said his experience of volunteering for 15 years at Sick Kids has been very humbling. "These kids did not ask to have cancer. They are stuck with it. Yet they are some of the most positive people I have ever met, always smiling.

Shinshinim to screen Israeli film at Temple Har Zion

Part of Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut awareness and fundraising project

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Young Israeli emissaries Oded Goffer and Stav Zelniker will screen an Israeli movie at Temple Har Zion May 3 as part of a Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut awareness and fundraising project.

Yom Hazikaron, which falls on May 5, commemorates Israel's fallen soldiers, and Yom Ha'atzmaut, on May 6, is a celebration of Israel's independence day.

The teens are among 19 shinshinim who've deferred IDF service for a year to work here at synagogues and Jewish schools, through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The acronym "shinshin" denotes "shnat sherut," the Hebrew words for "a year of service." Goffer and Zelniker, natives of Haifa and Tel Aviv respectively, work at Temple Har Zion and the Montessori Jewish Day School.

They wanted to create a program that would have "a big impact" and promote understanding, Goffer said.

As of April 3, the pair had raised more than $400 from donors at Har Zion after launching their initiative four weeks earlier. They hope to raise $600-plus by Yom Hazikaron.

The funds will be used to purchase fleece neck warmers for Unit 50, a frontline combat unit in the IDF, which has 170 soldiers. Goffer, who will join the unit when he enters the IDF on his return to Israel, and Zelniker, who has a friend in the troop, wanted to provide something the soldiers wouldn't receive otherwise, and they wanted to be able to give something to each soldier in the unit, Zelniker said.

As well, Goffer added, "We wanted to give them the feeling that someone cares about them, even outside of Israel... No one here knows any of the soldiers, but still they appreciate what the soldiers are doing."

If the shinshinim exceed their target goal, they would like to help more units, or perhaps buy sweaters instead of less costly neck warmers to keep soldiers warm on cool evenings.

At Montessori, the shinshinim have worked with children from preschool to Grade 8 on Yom Ha'atzmaut projects ranging from dance to artwork and creative writing. Older children have learned about IDF soldiers as part of activities organized by the two Israelis. Parents will see their children's work at a Yom Ha'atzmaut exhibit at the school. "And, by the way, if they want to donate money, they are more than welcome," Zelniker said.

At Har Zion, at 7:30 on the Saturday evening preceding Yom Hazikaron, Goffer and Zelniker will screen the Israeli movie Broken Wings, about a mother and her four children dealing with the loss of her husband/their father. The movie, which will have a concurrent program for young children, will be followed by a discussion focusing on how common it is in Israel to know someone who died during the wars, Goffer said. Admission is $5 for adults, $2.50 for students.

Goffer noted that his uncle lost a hand in the Yom Kippur War, and Zelniker added that she has a friend whose family died in a terror attack.

"It's very close to us, and we wanted to pass this feeling to the community," Goffer said. "We go from Yom Hazikaron to the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration, because we're very thankful for whatever the soldiers are doing."

All the Toronto shinshinim are working on projects at their own placements, as well as a Yom Hazikaron ceremony for federation staff. ■

Produces a dozen varieties of cannabis

It's guarded like a military facility and its product is delivered in Brinks-like trucks.

Altogether, Tikun Olam produces a dozen varieties of cannabis, she said.

Tikun Olam, which is Hebrew for repairing the world, operates its own clinic in Hadarim, north of Tel Aviv. Patients who are prescribed cannabis by their doctors consult with Tikun Olam intake workers, who are trained nurses. They are interviewed and matched up with the best marijuana for their illness, Closner said.

Follow-up calls to check on the patient's progress come a month and six months later. Doctors are kept informed about the specific marijuana that was employed.

Canadian regulations prevent MedReleaf from offering a retail service of that kind, Closner said. Instead, patients, once they've got a physician's document, similar to a prescription, send in the original document. They later visit the MedReleaf web site, register, and receive a user ID. They place their order online and a MedReleaf staffer, who is a nurse, contacts them to discuss their case. Based on their condition, and relying on the expertise developed in Israel, the appropriate variety is sent to the patient via courier.

Like its Israeli partner, MedReleaf follows up with patients.

Israel's Ministry of Health granted its first license to cultivate cannabis in 2007, and in 2010 it set the maximum price that a patient could be charged at 370 shekels ($117) a month. (In Canada, licensed producers charge between $5 and $13.50 a gram, though some offer lower prices in compassionate cases.)

Tikun Olam went into business shortly after that. It opened the first store in Israel for the sale and distribution of medical cannabis on Ibn Gabirol Street in Tel Aviv.

Israel's more liberal laws permit Tikun Olam to dispense dosages in the form of capsules, in a vaporizer or as drops of oil. In Canada, only the leaves can be used, requiring patients to roll their own marijuana cigarettes, hardly the healthiest way to ingest the product, Closner said.

Closner, who has been involved in health-care businesses and startups for 20 years, said he first heard about Tikun Olam through MENA Investment Network, which "looked to export Israeli technology outside of Israel."

He admits he was skeptical at first, but a visit to Israel changed his mind.

He visited the Hadarim Geriatric Home where he saw medical marijuana put to use.

Israeli patients suffering from Parkinson's disease, dementia and chronic pain were being helped by cannabis. In one case, he saw an elderly Holocaust survivor, who loved to paint but who suffered from uncontrollable shaking, regain control of his limbs and enjoy his hobby once again.

"I left after a few hours in complete awe at what I'd seen. I left feeling this really is legitimate," he said. ■

Toronto student creates successful film festival

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@cjnews.com

When high school student Rebecca Baruch decided she wanted to create an outlet for students who, like her, had a passion for filmmaking, she remembered the lesson her parents instilled in her.

"My parents, Ron and Sharon, are very generous people, and they always taught us that whatever you do, whatever you're passionate about, you should use it to repair the world," said Baruch, a 17-year-old student at Toronto's Bishop Strachan School (BSS), who founded the Spotlight Charity Film Festival, which successfully ran at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema earlier this month.

"I've always been interested in film. It's a passion of mine and I think BSS instilled that because I didn't know a lot about film. Then I took one film class and I fell in love," she said.

"I'd always seen art around my school, like paintings and sculptures, but I never felt there was a place to show my work as a filmmaker."

But giving aspiring filmmakers a creative outlet and showcasing young talent was only part of her vision.

"I think it's important to make art, but I also think you should do something with your art because I was always taught about tikkun olam and tzedakah, so I wanted to take the art and use it for charity."

After forming a committee of her peers in younger grades and collecting submissions from students at other same-sex schools in Toronto, including Upper Canada College and St. Michael's College School, Baruch and her committee worked on fundraising.

"A lot of the money was raised through ticket sales. We reached out to our friends and family," she said, adding that they raised almost $4,000.

The funds raised were divided between the three winners of the festival, as well as the festival committee.

Baruch said she chose to donate her portion to an organization called Sketch, which helps homeless people through art therapy classes. The other organizations receiving a donation include Covenant House and the Hospital for Sick Children.

Baruch, who is enrolled in the Newhouse School's film, television and radio program at Syracuse University, explained that the submissions had to be narrative pieces, and each of the three winners produced a unique short film.

Rebecca Baruch

In the Grade 9-10 category, Faiz Khwaja won for his film Strange Love, Mary McNee won the Grade 11 category for her film called Girl Come To Me in a Dream, and Julia Thompson won the Grade 12 category for her film Breakthrough.

"The winner for the Grade 9-10 category was actually a Grade 8 student. He did a really cute video that was like Spike Jones' movie Her, where there was a man who fell in love with a pepper shaker... The next one was by a girl on our committee, and her film was a stop motion animation film about a stuffed animal bunny who wanted to find his other half... It has a happy ending, which was good," Baruch said.

"The winner of the Grade 12 category, which I think was the most competitive category, was Julia Thompson, and she also made a stop motion animation film. She is very interested in fashion, so it was an Andy Warhol piece, sort of, where this girl, who is schizophrenic, kind of walks through her house and goes through her day, and everything she sees is coloured and different. There were designs everywhere, it had edgy music and it was really cool."

The films were judged by a panel that included film director Larysa Kondracki, and film critics including Peter Howell and Liam Lacey.

Baruch said she hopes the younger members of her committee will keep the festival going and continue to pass the torch to their peers for years to come.

"The festival is about letting new artists shine." ■

Dancer struts her stuff with Toronto Raptors

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dani Kagan

Dani Kagan has been dancing for most of her life. She began participating in competitive dance when she was in elementary school and continued through university.

She has performed in many different venues across Ontario, but this year Kagan, 23, is dancing on the biggest stage of her career.

She is a member of the Toronto Raptors Dance Pak. Her stage is the basketball court at the Air Canada Centre (ACC).

"It's almost surreal to be on the NBA court," Kagan says. "It's really so cool to be dancing in such a big venue. Some nights there are 20,000 people."

She says she's lucky to be on the Raptors dance team, especially this year. "It's been such big year for the team. Drake became our global ambassador and we're in the playoffs.

"That means my contract gets extended, so I get to dance longer this season."

Kagan auditioned for the Raptors Dance Pak last summer. "I was ecstatic when I made the team. I didn't think I'd make it, because I didn't think I'd fit the niche... I'm curvier than other dancers.

"I was pleasantly surprised at the huge mix of girls on the team. Some are tall and thin, others are curvy and short. The audition was based on talent, not just looks."

She says the dance team members get along very well with each other. "We all share the same passion for dance. That's what bonds us. It's a great experience."

The practice schedule is rigorous, because the dancers need to learn some 30 different routines and about a dozen formations, she says. "We perform a different dance every game. Our coach, Amberley Waddell, is a renowned dancer/choreographer in Toronto. She's been trained in a lot of dance styles and she incorporates them into our routines."

Kagan stresses that the Raptors Dance Pak is not a cheerleading squad. "We're dancers. We're one of the only NBA dance teams that doesn't use pompoms."

The dancers have a hectic schedule on the day of a home game. There's an hour-long rehearsal on the court in the afternoon, and by 6 p.m., they are at the gate greeting fans.

The Pak dances briefly at the start of the game, and then they toss T-shirts and other giveaways into the crowd. Following a costume change, they distribute more giveaways.

After the third costume change, they're on the court with a new dance routine. In the second quarter, the team dances again.

At half time, the dancers bring birthday greetings to specific fans and they get a chance to rest. During the fourth quarter, the girls dance in the tunnels and perform again on the court during the time-outs.

Kagan says when the score is close, there are often more time-outs. "That's fun for me, because we get to dance more out on the court."

She says being in the Toronto Raptors Dance Pak requires a significant time commitment beyond the preparations on game day. There are three evenings of practices weekly and the dancers do appearances throughout the city. "It's more than a part-time job, but it's not a full-time job," she says."

When she joined the dance team, Kagan put school on hold, but she says she's resuming her course work in political science and Jewish studies at the University of Toronto this summer.

She juggles the demanding schedule of the Dance Pak with other dance work. She's the director of operations at LR Productions, a company that hires out dancers for different events. "I get the gigs. I book dancers and I do most of the choreography for the company."

She also teaches jazz, tap, acrobatics and hip hop at two different studios, and she continues to take dance classes. "When you're a dancer, you're always a work in progress. You can always refine your art."

And while she enjoys doing choreography and teaching, Kagan says nothing beats performing. "I love to dance. Being a member of the Raptors Dance Pak, I've really built up my confidence performing in front of so many people. It's an incredible experience." ■

Let's ensure a promising future for Sephardi Jewry

RABBI ILAN ACOCA

Chachamim (our sages) teach us that during the month of Nisan, we have to think about being freed from the bondage of Mitzrayim (Egypt). Mitzrayim comes from the root metzarim, which translates to strait – a narrow passage. During this month, we have to set our mind to getting out of the narrowness that life leads us into and look at the broader scene.

People often get stagnant and resist change. The sages teach us that we have to welcome change by thinking out of the box and getting out of our mental bondage.

I often encounter Pesach guides that do not represent the Sephardi opinion. It is something that many of my Sephardi colleagues share with me.

A story is told about Chacham Ovadiah Yosef that when he became the Sephardi chief rabbi of Tel Aviv, he was surprised to find out that in the Pesach guide that was sent to the Tel Aviv residents, it was written that rice may not be consumed on Pesach. Rabbi Yosef summoned the rabbi in charge of the guide and asked him to promptly change that.

Due to the vision of Rabbi Yosef, Sephardi communities all over the world are thriving. Sephardim are proud of their heritage because one man freed himself from his mental bondage and built the future of Sephardim worldwide.

We recently had the honour of hosting Yehuda Azoulay for a Shabbaton at our shul in Vancouver. Azoulay is a young, accomplished scholar who is dedicating his life to the future of the Sephardi Jewry. From his youth, he foresaw the lack of information in English regarding Sephardi history. He went to Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, who blessed him and encouraged him to take on the important task of bringing to light the rich history of our Sephardi ancestors. Azoulay has already published five books, written many articles and had an inaugural tribute luncheon in the U.S. Senate honouring Sephardi Jewry.

I was privileged to spend time with him walking around the seawall of Stanley Park. Through the talk we had, I realized how there could be a promising future for the Sephardi community.

The question is, what are Sephardi Jews suppose to do to ensure a promising future? There are three points to answer the question. Point one is to get educated. From my experience, many Sephardi Jews do not know how rich their Sephardi heritage is. Let me give you one example. There is a song titled Yah Ribon Olam that is commonly sung in both Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities. I often ask people around our Shabbat table who wrote the song? Most of the time, people have no clue, and when I inform them that it was written by Rabbi Israel Najara who was born in Damascus in the 16th century, people are amazed. Point two is to create awareness and to use any available tool to do so. Point three is to be united as Sephardi Jews and to create a body that will represent Sephardi Judaism.

May HaShem give us the wisdom and conviction to do so. Amen. ■

Featured Exhibition in the 2014 Scotiabank CONTACT Photography Festival

OPENING RECEPTION: Thursday, April 24, 2014 | 6 – 9 PM | FREE | Regular exhibition hours: Tuesday to Friday, 12 – 6 PM | Saturday & Sunday, 11 AM – 5 PM

Vancouver-based artist Adad Hannah has earned an international reputation for his video-recorded tableaux vivants that often reference art history and paradigms of museum practices. In this new body of work, Hannah shifts focus to his Jewish family history, re-animating a "frozen moment" captured eighteen years before he was born. Positioning for the first time a family member – his mother, Barbara Txi Hannah – as collaborator rather than as subject or model, Hannah pushes his practice deeper than ever into the exploration of what has historically been the most popular genre of photography – the family snapshot.

Hospital daycare plan fails to get approval

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@cjnews.ca MONTREAL

Unions and management at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in Montreal are demanding an answer from the Quebec government as to why the JGH can't get on-site subsidized daycare for employees' children.

Management gave its backing to a lunch-hour demonstration in front of the hospital April 4 by representatives of the three unions to which the JGH's more than 5,000 employees belong. The rally was held to raise awareness of the long-standing issue.

Physiotherapist Pierre Allard, president of the Alliance du personnel professionel et technique de la santé, said the JGH has been trying for about 10 years to have a $7-a-day Centre de la petite enfance (CPE).

Staff hold a demonstration outside the Jewish General Hospital to draw attention to the government's repeated rejection of their request for on-site subsidized daycare.

Allard said every other major hospital has a CPE, including the JGH's closest neighbouring institutions, St. Mary's Hospital and Hôpital Ste. Justine, which have had CPEs for years and now have about 150 to 200 spaces at each institution.

Hôpital Maisonneuve-Rosemont has had a CPE even longer, for close to 15 years, he added.

The latest rejection of the JGH's application for a permit came in December – with no explanation, he said.

This occurred even though an expert was hired to see that the application was in order and to present the JGH's case to the Ministry of Families.

'These kids have fought harder than I had ever had to'

"These kids have fought harder than I have ever had to. Stepping into the ring on May 31 and getting punched in the face won't be fun, but neither is having cancer. Whatever I have to go through on fight night is nothing compared to what someone with this disease has to go through every day."

To prepare for his boxing match, Krystantos has been training at the Kingsway Boxing Club with coaches Virgil Barrow and Jennifer Huggins, founder of FTEC.

The members of the 2014 fight team have undergone a rigorous six-month introduction to the techniques of Olympic-style boxing – training that culminates in a fight that consists of a rapid three rounds in six minutes.

Currently, FTEC is seeking more boxers, as well as sponsors who want to get directly involved.

To date, Krystantos has personally raised almost $8,000 for cancer research and awareness. The entire fight team has raised more than $30,000, he said.

FTEC tickets range from $225 for a single seat to $2,000 for a 10-seat table.

Daycare proposal rejected on numerous occasions

"When we asked why [it was rejected], we were bluntly told it's none of our business," Allard said.

"We have been doing backflips to try to understand what is missing... At least give us a reason, something substantive, and we could fix it."

Allard said the rejection can't be construed as political, because the response has been the same whatever party has been in power over the past decade. He suspects this may be a case of bureaucratic intransigence – the same public servants, year after year, out of habit, filing the same response each time.

Some years ago, lack of appropriate space was given as a reason, Allard said, but that could not be a serious objection today because the JGH has since acquired property north of its main campus.

The CPE would be located in a two-story building between the former convent the JGH bought on Côte des Neiges Road and the A Pavilion, he said.

Ideally, the CPE would have 100 spaces, but 70 is likely the most the JGH could expect at first, he said.

Allard noted that the CPE would be open to all children, regardless of religion or culture, reflecting the diversity of the staff. In December 2010, the then Liberal government introduced a regulation banning anything deemed to be religious instruction or practice in the CPEs.

"There are other daycares in the area [of the JGH], but they are all full. I know people who have had to quit their jobs and work closer to home," he said.

"The hospital is at a loss as to why the application was rejected and shares the frustration and disappointment felt by its staff," the JGH said in a statement.

Beverly Kravitz, director of human resources and legal affairs, noted that "one of the objectives in the 2010-2015 Health Minister's strategic plan is that all establishments put into place 'employer of choice' strategies to improve the work climate and improve the well-being of staff. An on-site daycare for employees is an important element in attaining this ministerial objective."■

Jeff McLaughlin with Hannah Pick, Anne Frank's best friend

Holocaust educator seeks forgiveness from daughter of survivors

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT WINNIPEG

It has been something that has been haunting Jeff McLaughlin for many years, and he has finally been able to exorcise the sense of guilt that he has been carrying with him.

In early March, he was able to get his burden off his back when he apologized to Betty Eisenstadt of Toronto, the daughter of Holocaust survivors Dov and Rachel Eisenstadt.

He recalls that he often went with his mother and older brother to The Bagel Shop, a bakery owned by Eisenstadt's parents on Selkirk Avenue in McLaughlin's hometown of Winnipeg, for bread, buns and donuts. The incident in question happened one time when McLaughlin and his friends – they were 13 or 14 at the time – went into The Bagel Shop for donuts.

"One of them yelled out a very derogatory term for being Jewish and we ran out of the bakery," he said. "This event has haunted me my entire life.

"I should forgive myself – everyone tells me that – because I didn't know any better, and because as kids we all do stupid and unthinking things," McLaughlin emailed Eisenstadt, "but I cannot, so I ask on behalf of your parents for your forgiveness."

While the incident may well be considered of little consequence to some, the fact that he retained a strong sense of guilt for remaining silent while friends insulted a couple of Jewish Holocaust survivors speaks volumes about the kind of man McLaughlin has turned out to be.

"Because I grew up with a speech impediment and was picked on quite a bit myself, I became sensitive to the feelings of others," said McLaughlin, a long time associate professor of philosophy at Thompson Rivers University in Kelowna, B.C.

One of the ways that McLaughlin has been trying to make amends is by helping to raise awareness of the Shoah. For the past 15 years, he has been a visiting professor at University of Graz in Austria during the summer. In Austria, he has been able to pursue his joint interest in the history of World War II and the Holocaust.

"Since I... live in Austria during the summer, where I teach at a university, I am able to do some research, but I don't just leave it at the theoretical level," McLaughlin said. "I also put it into practice."

He reports, for example, that he successfully petitioned the Austrian government to clean up the forgotten Jewish cemetery in Graz, where he teaches. "When I was told by a friend who's a member of the Gusen Concentration Camp Memorial Society that people kept tearing down the direction signs for how to get to the camp, I sent off letters to the city council and they funded the creation of permanent signs," he said.

McLaughlin tracked down Eisenstadt via the Internet

"When I was teaching business ethics to students from around the world, I hired a bus and took them to Mauthausen so that they could see for themselves what slave labour involved."

McLaughlin has been to Yad Vashem twice, first for a conference and then last year, when he received a full scholarship to study at its summer seminar, where he says he was exposed to lectures from world-class experts.

"I was the first philosopher to conduct research at the former Spielberg Shoah foundation, and I convinced my department to raise the money to purchase a set of video testimonies from a British Columbia survivor," he said. "We are the only university to have such a set."

One of the courses McLaughlin teaches is called "Ethics and the Holocaust." He said he has visited many of the camps in Europe and conducted interviews with several survivors. He recently had a survivor from Vancouver do a videoconference with his class in Kelowna.

"I was able to arrange with the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre to Skype in a speaker for 90 minutes," he said. "It was a powerful and rewarding experience for my students. Several came up to me after class to thank me."

As well, he was the keynote speaker at a recent genocide symposium for high school students in Kelowna. More than 300 students were in attendance.

McLaughlin said he tracked Betty Eisenstadt down via the Internet. She was so moved by his email apology that she contacted The CJN.

"He is an amazing man," she wrote The CJN. "I think it's very important to highlight people like this who are not of our faith, especially in these times of rising anti-Semitism." ■

Israeli doctors do cardiology training in Toronto

A kosher reception looking at Innovations in Cardiac Medicine, hosted by Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre recently, focused on the fact that the Schulich Heart Centre at Sunnybrook has become the world's leading centre for training Israeli cardiology fellows. Sunnybrook currently has five cardiac fellows from Israel working in the centre, more than any other heart centre in the world. Dr. Menash Shuvy, a fellow in the Schulich heart program, came to the hospital from Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, and will return to Israel to use the clinical and research skills acquired here. Shuvy moved his family, including four children. Seen, from left, are Dr. Menash Shuvy, fellow in the Schulich heart program; Dr. Bradley Strauss, chief of the Schulich heart program; and Dr. Amit Segev, secretary general of the Israel Heart Society.

Düsseldorf remembers art dealer Max Stern

CJN STAFF
MONTREAL

A 12th Nazi-looted painting has been restituted to the university heirs of the late German Jewish art dealer Max Stern, who owned the Dominion Gallery in Montreal for many years.

A rare self portrait of the 19th-century German painter Wilhelm Schadow was formally returned on April 7 to Concordia University, McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem by the City of Düsseldorf.

This act of restitution has special significance because Düsseldorf was Stern's native city and where he ran an art gallery until the Nazi regime forced him to close and forcibly sell off his collection.

Clarence Epstein, who has headed Concordia's Max Stern Restitution Project since its launch in 2002, was present at the ceremony at city hall to reclaim the artwork on behalf of the heirs, along with the Canadian ambassador to Germany, Marie Gervais-Vidricaire.

Under an agreement with the Stern estate, the painting will be loaned to the Düsseldorf City Museum, where it has been on display for several decades, for the public to continue to view.

This 19th-century Wilhelm Schadow self portrait has been restituted to the Max Stern estate but will remain on public view in Düsseldorf. At the same time, Düsseldorf Lord Mayor Dirk Elbers announced a project for international scholarly collaboration on the matter of art restitution. Concordia will be one of the lead partners.

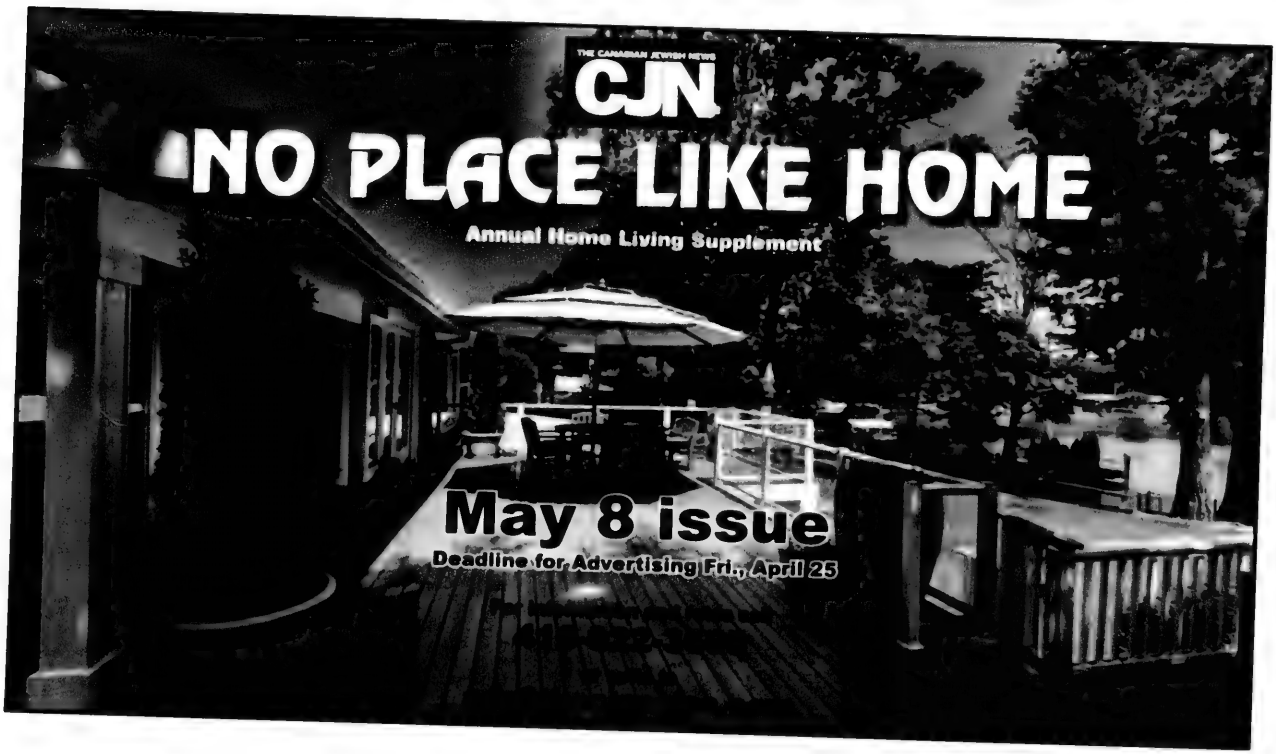
Schadow (1788-1862) was director of the Düsseldorf Academy of the Arts, an art school attended by students who went on to become some of Germany's greatest artists.

"We are very pleased that an unprecedented number of German institutions have finally recognized and acted on our claims," said Concordia president Alan Shepard.

"Adding to the recoveries of paintings from Stuttgart and Cologne in the last year, Düsseldorf and its museum are demonstrating the kind of leadership needed in addressing looted art matters."

The museum is home to a series of drawings by Jewish children and teens from the Nazi era that was the subject of a recent project. An exhibition on Jewish life in Düsseldorf is planned for next year.

A major exhibition is scheduled for 2018 dedicated to Max Stern to be held in the Galerie Stern. The gallery was founded by his father in 1913 and was a landmark of the city's main Königsallee until its forced closure. ■



Canadian OT changing lives in Israel

Hadassah Fortinsky, centre in purple, and a group of Reuth staff on a trip.

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, TEL AVIV

Inspired by her patients, Torontonian Hadassah Fortinsky is helping push occupational therapy into a leading role in Israel's modern health-care system. When she began working at Reuth Medical & Rehabilitation Center in Tel Aviv 15 years ago, she was the only occupational therapist on staff. "Now, we're up to 20 occupational therapists," she says.

The role of occupational therapy (OT) is far broader than most people know, especially in the busy life of this rehabilitative and chronic-care hospital in Tel Aviv, where Fortinsky is assistant manager of occupational therapy. From 25 beds in 1961, Reuth has grown to a 350-bed modern facility; about 70 per cent of patients live in the hospital permanently.

When she arrived at Reuth, as the sole OT, there wasn't much focus on rehabilitation. "It wasn't an exciting place to work," she says. "Over time, [following] guidelines from the Ministry of Health in Israel… we grew a huge department."

At Reuth, patients are grouped by age, rather than by diagnosis, as in many other facilities. On any given day, an OT may help stroke and cardiac or lung patients, car accident victims, post-surgical patients, severely disabled children and individuals with multiple sclerosis, ALS and other degenerative neurological conditions.

Often, they focus on regaining abilities and independence so patients can return to daily life. But even when that's not possible, OTs work to ensure quality of life. "We'll work with the recreational therapist to find… leisure activities, handiwork, games, access to computers, sports or current events groups, depending on their ability to understand."

OTs also help adapt technology to physical abilities, whether patients can sit up and use a mouse and keyboard or simply use head or eye motions to indicate a yes/no response.

Discovering those responses requires a long-term assessment that may surprise doctors and family members. "It takes a lot of education and teamwork for families and staff to understand that this person can communicate at some level, and what those movements may mean."

"We work with the family and with the patient to increase their level of response, so there can be some sort of meaningful communication."

One common factor in patients' lives is the shock they are in when they first meet Fortinsky or one of her colleagues, she says. Especially younger patients often tell her, "You don't understand, a week ago, I was fine." Then, they broke a hip, had a car accident or a stroke, and suddenly, they're struggling to return to tasks that were simple just a week before: walking, eating, doing up buttons.

When Fortinsky came to Israel, she didn't need to requalify. Today, olim must take a standardized exam before they can work here. Now a member of the Board of Occupational Therapists, Fortinsky translates the national OT exam to make it accessible for English-speaking olim.

"Anybody who studied in North America can definitely pass the local exam; the material is very, very similar, if not identical." With enough Hebrew, it's easy to start working in the field. "The scope of practice is very similar. If you were doing certain things in North America, it's easy to do the same things here."

With the Hebrew she learned at Eitz Chaim Day Schools and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Fortinsky was well prepared to hit the ground running at Reuth. "The background that I had culturally, Jewishly, language-wise, and OT-wise, I was able to manage very, very well here."

However, there are cultural differences in OT practice, especially in the area of documentation and paperwork. "There's more in North America than there is here, to our benefit." There's still documentation in Israel, just not as much. "Here, it's a reasonable and professional amount."

More than just an employee, she calls herself a "huge fan of Reuth," which she says is "very, very warm… you feel like the patients are really the focus of the organization. The pyramid is not steep; it's a very responsive organization."

Working there, she says, is well worth the 45-minute daily commute – long by Israeli standards – to her home in Raanana, where she volunteers with her synagogue's youth department, and helps brides navigate the Israeli marriage process. Marathons are another hobby; she ran the Tel Aviv marathon in March.

She regularly attends Israeli OT conferences, where she has watched the field expand and progress, particularly in the area of technology. "In the past five years, there are at least two new schools that have opened to study OT." The Israeli Ministry of Health now insists on OTs in all its facilities, and there are "tons of job openings."

As for staying in the profession as long as she has, "it's not easy but I draw inspiration from my patients, especially the older adults who come in following an injury or stroke. They tell me, 'I was able to get around until now; I'm 80… I can handle this as well.' That gives me the motivation to come back here and say, 'if they're willing to try, I'm willing to try.'" ■

Ukrainian Jews urged to back Russia

Several anti-Semitic attacks have occurred since November

JTA

Pro-Russian separatists from Donetsk in eastern Ukraine denied any involvement in the circulation of flyers calling on Jews to register with separatists and pay special taxes.

The flyers were distributed in the city last week. Pro-Russian separatists led by Denis Pushilin took over several government buildings earlier this month and declared their secession from Ukraine as the Donetsk Republic, during a standoff with authorities.

The flyers were official-looking documents that carried what was presented as Pushilin's signature, but the news site tvrain.ru quoted Pushilin as denying any connection to the flyers, calling them a provocation.

Oleksandr Feldman, Jewish member of the Ukrainian parliament has expressed concern over the continued violence in Ukraine and fear that Jews might be targeted

On April 15, the news website novosti.dn.ua reported that the flyers were handed out that day by three unidentified men in balaclava masks carrying a flag of the Russian Federation. According to the report, the men distributed the flyers next to a local synagogue. The website quoted unnamed sources from the local Jewish community as saying that the flyers were an attempt to provoke a conflict and blame the attack on the separatists.

Several anti-Semitic attacks, including a stabbing and the attempted torching of a synagogue, have occurred in Ukraine since the eruption in November of a revolution over the perceived pro-Russian policies of former president Viktor Yanukvych. He was ousted from power in February.

Many supporters of the revolution blamed pro-Russian provocateurs for the attacks.

The flyers in Donetsk said all Jews who are 16 years old and above should register at the government building, which separatist protesters are occupying, and pay a registration fee of $50 by May 3.

"Jews supported the nationalistic gang of [Stepan] Bandera in Kiev," the authors wrote in reference to the Ukrainian nationalist leader who in the 1940s fought with Nazi Germany against Soviet troops before he and his men took up arms against the German occupation.

The flyers also said Jews were hostile to the Donetsk Republic.

They were required to report any real estate and automobiles, the flyers also said. ■

Amsterdam collected $14M from Holocaust survivors

JTA

THE HAGUE — The city of Amsterdam collected more than $10 million (all figures US) from Holocaust survivors who were charged ground lease fees for periods they spent in hiding or in concentration camps, researchers said.

The team of researchers for the Institute for War, Holocaust and Genocide Studies, or NIOD, wrote their findings in a still unpublished report they have been compiling since last year at the city's request, the Het Parool daily reported Tuesday.

The city, under Mayor Eberhard van der Laan, asked NIOD to look into fines that the city had imposed on hundreds of Jewish Holocaust survivors for properties they owned but for which they had failed to pay ground lease fees after the German army's invasion into the Netherlands in 1940. Nazi authorities in 1942 began the deportation and murder of 75 per cent of the 140,000 Jews then living in the Netherlands.

Many of the houses in question were used by Nazi occupation officers and local collaborators, Het Parool reported. The city went after Holocaust survivors for missed payments as late as 1947 and imposed fines on them for missing payments, according to the daily, whose publication on the issue last year prompted the investigation.

The NIOD researchers estimate the city received a total of $14.5 million from fines unjustly levied against Jews during the relevant period, according to Ronny Naftaniel, a former chief negotiator for the Dutch Jewish community in restitution talks and a member of the supervisory committee of the NIOD research.

The researchers have obtained documents that prove the city took $6.76 million from 217 Jews who objected to the fines levied on them, Naftaniel added. The $14.5 million estimate includes cases of Jews who paid and did not object.

Eberhard van der Laan. WIKIMEDIA COMMONS

"What has come to light is a scandalous procedure, in which people were stripped of their homes and then made to pay for those who moved [into the homes] in their place," Naftaniel said.

He and other Jewish members of the supervisory committee have called on the city to begin making restitution to descendants of the Holocaust survivors who were made to pay unjustly, or the Jewish community in cases where descendants cannot be traced.

Van der Laan, a son of resistance fighters, and the city council of Amsterdam are expected to decide in the near future how to proceed and on what topics further research is necessary. ■

Russian billionaire books entire hotel

JERUSALEM

Russian-Jewish billionaire Roman Abramovich booked an entire hotel in Israel for Passover.

Abramovich and his partner Darya Zhukova, a billionaire fashion designer and businesswoman, rented all 111 rooms at the Beresheet Hotel in Mitzpe Ramon in southern Israel, London's Daily Mail reported. The cost was estimated at $450,000.

The owner of the top-tier English soccer team Chelsea, was to host family and friends during the holiday, including a seder in a tent specially constructed in the desert, according to the newspaper. The hotel has a view of the Ramon Crater, the world's largest crater created by erosion. ■

For us, it's a time of year like no other

Yair Lootstein

This season in Israel is unique. Beginning with the preparations for Pesach and concluding at Shavuot and beyond, this time of year is jam-packed with holidays and days of commemoration. Not even a week after Passover and Mimouna, we somberly observe Yom Hashoah. A week later, we experience the annual catharsis of Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut one day after another. Ten days or so afterward, our kids take immense pleasure in the night-long bonfires of Lag b'Omer, the most environmentally unfriendly day of our yearly calendar, and before we get to Shavuot, we either celebrate or commemorate Jerusalem Day.

To add to this schedule, only a fortnight after Shavuot, school will be out for junior high and high school students, and teachers know they must cram in most of the annual curriculum by Pesach break, as teaching anything substantial during the remaining eight weeks of the school year is almost impossible.

And the weather. If you're here this time of year, you'll certainly enjoy a mostly wonderful springtime climate, but inevitably you'll probably also endure a Middle Eastern meteorological phenomenon known as chamsin, from the Arabic, or sharav in modern Hebrew. Several times during this season, we're afflicted with strong, dry, hot winds originating from the deserts of northern Africa, bringing with them blistering hot temperatures, often making these some of the hottest days of our year.

That would be bearable, but what these winds also bring with them are inordinate quantities of fine desert sand, which covers huge swaths of the country, creating a thick, orangey otherworldly haze. Infants, old people and anyone suffering from pulmonary or cardiological conditions are warned to stay indoors. The haze severely limits visibility, and even airports are sometimes temporarily closed.

These easterly winds are also the bane of homeowners, for no matter how tightly we seal and shutter our homes, the fine sand seems to permeate everything, leaving exorable layers of dust on everything indoors and out. Invariably, a chamsin hits the country just after everyone has finished their Pesach cleaning, adding a plague-like ambience while we prepare for our one seder – a definite advantage for those of us living in Israel. I can no longer fathom partaking in two.

Within this seasonal mishmash, next Monday we'll commemorate Yom Hashoah, one of the most significant days of my yearly calendar. Sunday evening, restaurants, pubs, cafés and theatres will close. Flags will be lowered to half-mast. At 10 a.m. Monday, air-raid sirens will sound around the country. Vehicles will stop wherever they are and most everyone will stand for two minutes of silence. Major ceremonies will take place at Yad Vashem and at several other special venues. Schools and military bases will hold assemblies and other acts of observance.

Throughout the day, radio and TV broadcasts will reflect the day's gravity. Documentaries will predominate. I find myself riveted to the stories only now being told on film and in other media. As the generation of survivors becomes smaller and smaller, many are now willing to tell their remarkable tales of suffering, bravery and compassion, before it's too late. Each story adds yet another stratum to the incomprehensible wholeness of the Shoah.

I find myself phoning my dad several times more often than usual on this particular day. He survived the war in Holland as a child, and Yom Hashoah seems more and more difficult for him with each passing year. Scars that have never really healed are reopened on this day – some I will never know, others I will never be able to understand.

And once that sober day is over, we'll begin thinking of Yom Hazikaron and planning our picnics in nature with friends on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

I know you observe all these days in Canada, too, but here in Israel, they're a much more intrinsic part of everyday life, and the transition from one to another is simply more complex. ■

Scary flicks at Film Fest

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Mikel Koven was 14, he went alone to the Eaton Centre cinemas in downtown Toronto to watch a re-release of Hallowe'en, John Carpenter's iconic horror classic. During the last half of the slasher flick, he said he was curled up in the fetal position, panicking and hyperventilating. Moviegoers sitting nearby asked him if he was okay.

"Like any drug addict, I have been searching for that high ever since," Koven says. "I've been lucky enough to forge [this love of horror] into a career."

Koven is a lecturer and professor of film studies at the University of Worcester in England, but is also a passionate horror movie buff. He will fly back to his hometown for the 22nd annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) next week to lead a program about Jewish horror films.

The program, Golems, Dybbuks and the Jewish Fantastic, will screen horror movies from filmmakers like Sidney Lumet, Roman Polanski and Larry Cohen. Koven will introduce many of the screenings in this program and lead a free talk about what Jewish horror cinema is.

Many American horror films have a religious slant that focuses on Christian theology. However, more genre films are drawing on Jewish mythology and folklore, says Stuart Hands, program manager for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

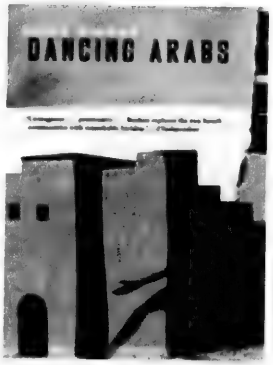
The 22nd annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from May 1 through May 11. Tickets are on sale now. Koven will introduce many of the titles. If the films happen to scare viewers to the point that they are in the fetal position, the lifelong horror fan will be satisfied. www.tjff.com

Novel offers window into Israeli Arab life

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Dancing Arabs
by Sayed Kashua, translated from the Hebrew by Miriam Shlesinger

Grove Press

Most of us Jews in Canada who support and love the State of Israel rarely think about the 20 per cent of Israeli citizens who are Arabs. I am not referring to Arabs who live in the West Bank and are not citizens, though they are subject to Israeli army law. I refer to the Arabs who live within the pre-1967 borders of Israel and who are full-fledged Israeli citizens. It is often argued that Israeli Arabs have, on average, more rights and privileges and a higher standard of living than Arabs who live in any of the countries bordering Israel. This is almost certainly correct. Arab citizens vote in Israeli elections, serve in the Israeli parliament and enjoy freedom of speech to an extent unheard of in that part of the world – as we all saw in videos of Arab Knesset members heckling Prime Minister Stephen Harper when he recently addressed the Knesset.

On the other hand, the educational and economic gap between Jewish and Arab citizens of the state is significant. Regardless of whose fault this is, many opportunities in Israel are open for Arabs in theory only. To choose a familiar example, Arab citizens of Israel are often subjected to more serious security checks than Jews are, for example when driving into the airport or walking onto a university campus.

As Israel continues to emphasize that it's a "Jewish state," citizens who aren't Jewish naturally feel a sense of discomfort. True, many people around the world live in countries where the official religion is not theirs. Even in my own youth, it was not uncommon to hear the claim that Canada was a "Christian country" and that Jews and other minorities were tolerated but not part of the dominant culture. But some countries are more tolerant of their minorities than others, and Israeli Arabs must deal with widespread suspicion of all Arabs due to the reality of Arab terrorism.

Few Israeli Jews have close friends who are Arabs. Many might not have any significant contact with those 20 per cent of their fellow citizens. One of the best known Israeli Arabs for the Jewish Israeli public is Sayed Kashua, who has been writing a weekly humour/satire column in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz for many years. Kashua also writes the scripts for a very funny sitcom on Israeli television entitled Avodah Aravit (Arab Labour). He has published three books that shed light on what daily life is like for an Israeli Arab.

His Dancing Arabs is a coming-of-age novel written in first person in the voice of a fictional Arab Israeli whose name we never learn. The life of the hero of the novel and Kashua's life overlap. They both come from the Israeli Arab city of Tira. They both excelled in their studies in elementary school and ended up going to an elite high school in Jerusalem (perhaps akin to Upper Canada College in Toronto) where they were part of a tiny number of Arab students in an almost entirely Jewish school. Both Kashua's real-life father and his fictional character's father were arrested on suspicion that they were involved in a terrorist bombing at the Hebrew University. Both fathers were held in administrative detention for a number of years and then released without being charged.

As in all books written in this genre, it's hard to know how much of the book is autobiographical. I hope the fictional narrator's description of the intolerable marital tensions with his wife and his problems with substance abuse are fiction, though I suspect that at least the dependence on alcohol might be anchored in Kashua's real life, since alcohol and drunken stupors play a role in his Ha'aretz columns too frequently for my taste.

The book provides a useful window into the life and concerns of an Israeli Arab trying to fit into daily life in Israel. As the narrator grows up, his own family and friends encourage him to be a proud Arab nationalist. But he often wishes he were a Jew, and he looks for acceptance in Jewish circles. He seems crushed when he figures out that his Jewish girlfriend sees their friendship simply as a high school fling and would never consider having a relationship with him after graduation.

In Israel, Kashua is beloved by many but mistrusted by others. Some Jews worry that he is an opponent of Zionism, and some Arabs see him as an Uncle Tom. During operation Cast Lead, Kashua wrote a satirical column in the voice of a right-wing Jew, saying that Arabs only understand force and that they have to be treated without compassion and hit hard until they understand who is boss. Unfortunately, a number of Arab Israeli readers did not realize the column was satirical and started a campaign against Kashua as an alleged traitor to his people. Kashua reacted by saying that apparently Israeli Arabs have not learned to identify cynicism.

This book sheds good fictional light on a serious Israeli social problem. But I must add that you miss something when you read it in English translation (although this translation, by Miriam Shlesinger, is readable and accurate).

Part of what makes Kashua a curious anomaly is that he writes in Hebrew, and in fact in a flowing and readable modern Hebrew. In Hebrew, he sounds like any educated secular Israeli Jew. It's important to remember that modern Hebrew isn't just a "Jewish language," but also the language of more than one million Arabs. ■

A taste of Paris at home

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ahh, Paris, the city of love, the city of lights, the city of memorable food. Whether or not you've actually been to the glorious city, eaten in its haute restaurants or pedestrian cafes, or visited its renowned markets, its gastronomic reputation precedes it. To eat in Paris is to savour one's food, to eat only what is in season, to let the dynamism of a certain ingredient flourish. It can take you back to Proust and transport you to what you can only imagine Escoffier championed.

Its culinary traditions are age old, buttressed as they are by waves of immigration, passing food fancies and trends that have managed to become mainstream. But perhaps I wax rhapsodic. It is true that Paris is now overrun by fast food joints and its cultural purists bemoan the "dumbing down" of French cuisine. But let's face it, that train is global and it's not hard to jump off at any side street and indulge in some authentic potage (soup), daube (stew) or pate (chopped liver, anyone?). There's also no reason to shy away because you think the dishes are wonderful only because they contain gobs of cream or butter. Not true, I say. The three recipes I have included here contain nary a tablespoon of cream or butter and yet still are infused with flavour and gusto. It's the perfect menu, rounded out by a side dish of haricots verts and a green salad, for special occasion dining, whether to impress hungry guests or for that very special Shabbat. ■

Creamy Cauliflower Soup With Parsley Coulis

This luscious creamy soup is velvety smooth and creamy due to the amount of cauliflower it contains as well as the potato. It can easily be made up to a day ahead and reheated gently stovetop. Be sure to cook the onion, celery and garlic slowly to coax out all of their natural sweetness and to avoid getting any colour into the mixture so that your soup will be as white as possible.

- ❑ 2 tbsp. vegetable oil
- ❑ 1 large onion, coarsely chopped
- ❑ 3 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 3 stalks celery, chopped
- ❑ 1 tsp. dried thyme
- ❑ ½ tsp. each salt and pepper
- ❑ 1 head cauliflower, cut into 1-in. florets
- ❑ 1 small potato, peeled and cut into chunks
- ❑ 6 cups chicken or vegetable broth

Parsley Coulis

- ❑ 1 cup packed fresh parsley leaves
- ❑ 3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

Heat oil in a large heavy saucepan set over medium-low heat. Add onion, garlic, celery, thyme and salt and pepper. Cover and cook for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Do not let the onion or the garlic brown or the soup will not be cream coloured.

Add cauliflower and potato to soup, tossing until well coated with the vegetables. Pour in broth. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for 25 to 30 minutes or until vegetables are very tender.

Meanwhile, in blender or food processor, finely chop parsley. Add oil. Puree together until finely chopped and blended. Remove from blender and set aside.

In batches, puree soup in clean blender or food processor. Reheat gently if necessary. Ladle into serving bowls. Dollop parsley coulis over, using a spoon or thin knife to make a decorative pattern. Makes 8 servings.

Chicken With Morels And Pearl Onions

I have served this intensely flavoured dish with both dried morels and a combination of porcini, shiitake and oyster and they are both delicious. Dried morels can sometimes be difficult to obtain, never mind expensive, so don't hesitate to make it with the latter variety. If you're having difficulty peeling the pearl onions, blanch them in some boiling water for 1 minute and their skins will easily slide off.

- ❑ 1 1/2 oz. dried morels (or a combination of dried porcini, shiitake and oyster mushrooms)
- ❑ ¼ cup all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1 tsp. herbes de provence
- ❑ ¾ tsp. salt
- ❑ ¼ tsp. pepper
- ❑ 2 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ ¼ cup Dijon mustard
- ❑ 3 bone-in whole chicken legs
- ❑ 2 bone-in chicken breasts
- ❑ 1 bag (10 oz.) pearl onions, peeled (about 18-21)
- ❑ 3 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ ½ cup white wine

Rinse dried mushrooms; place in a bowl. Pour 2 cups very hot water over mushrooms. Let stand at room temperature for 30 minutes.

Combine the flour, herbes de provence, salt and pepper in a shallow bowl. Heat oil in a large shallow saucepan, large enough to hold all the chicken at once, over medium-high heat. Brush mustard evenly over chicken pieces. One at a time, coat chicken pieces in the flour mixture, reserving any leftover flour. Sear chicken in hot oil on both sides, about 5 minutes per side. Remove to a plate.

Meanwhile, reserving the soaking liquid, drain mushrooms. Chop coarsely and set aside. Pour the soaking liquid through a fine mesh sieve into a bowl to remove any debris or grit.

Reduce heat to medium heat. Add onions, garlic to saucepan and cook for 2 minutes. Stir in mushrooms. Sprinkle any remaining flour over mushrooms and cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Pour in reserved soaking liquid and wine. Bring to a boil. Nestle chicken back into liquid. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 45 minutes or until chicken is no longer pink inside. Makes 8 servings.

Brown Sugar Cinnamon Palmiers

Despite what I said, it is well nigh impossible to find a French dessert that does not contain either butter or cream, unless you're looking at a fresh fruit dish or a poached fruit. In place of a traditional tart or torte, I have included a simple recipe for Cinnamon Palmiers that can easily be made up to 24 hours ahead and are sweet enough to stand up to a dark roast coffee and some fresh melon.

- ❑ 1 1/2 cups granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup packed light brown sugar
- ❑ 1 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1 397 mL frozen parve puff pastry, defrosted

Preheat the oven to 450. Line 2 cookie sheets with parchment paper.

In a bowl, combine the granulated and brown sugars, cinnamon and salt, mixing until well combined.

Transfer 1 cup of this mixture to a large piece of parchment paper. Place one square of the puff pastry on top of the sugar. Carefully roll out the square to a 12-in. square.

Pour ½ cup of the sugar mixture on top of the pastry. Roll out until it is a 14-in. square, making sure the sugar is pressed into the bottom and top of the pastry. Starting at one side, fold half of the dough so that it covers half of the dough. Repeat on the other side. Again, starting at one short side, roll up the dough jelly roll style, again just to the centre of the rectangle; roll up other side to meet in the middle. Press the sides firmly together. Gently turn over.

Using a sharp knife, cut into ¼ - ½-in. thick slices. Transfer to prepared baking sheets. Repeat with remaining puff pastry and sugar.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 7 minutes. Flip cookies over. Bake for 4 to 6 minutes or until both sides are caramelized. Cool in pan on rack. Remove to rack to cool completely. Makes about 3 1/2 dozen palmiers.

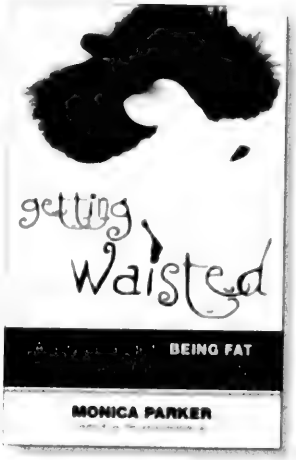
Actress gets waisted in her new memoir

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Getting Waisted is Monica Parker's personal memoir, which takes a candid look into her life as a serial dieter. Parker, an actress and writer, shares tales of growing from a chubby baby into a chunky adult with passion and wit in this book inspired by her one-woman stage show, Sex, Pies & a Few White Lies.

Parker moved back to Toronto from Los Angeles almost five years ago. "If I hadn't come back to Toronto, I don't think I would have written the play, because L.A. is a place of distraction, there is always things to do because it is nice outside. It is a town about business, so you are always off negotiating, hustling or doing something.

"When I came back here and faced that first winter in 28 years – I didn't want to go out. I hadn't really settled here. I was a new, old girl. I knew the city but it wasn't in my personal GPS," she said. "I would stand at the kitchen sink and say how did this happen, but I wanted it to happen. I wanted to be here near my family. But, still it wasn't home, so I decided to sit down and write a show."



Monica Parker

The show was a success, and from this, the Scottish-born actress fell into a speaking career. Through that, people suggested that she write a book. Not daunted by the fact that she had never written one, she was up for the challenge. Parker wrote a lengthy proposal, sent it out to three American agents, two of which wanted to represent her.

Parker says writing the book was just a joy. "In the book, every chapter begins with a diet, how much money I spent on it, how much weight I lost and how much weight I gained as soon as I stopped it, including the three that nearly killed me."

Parker says it was fun to rip open her guts and talk about everything that has been her life including her struggle with weight. "What I really got from this book was whatever challenges you are given in life, if you flip that on its head you really see those are the gifts you are given. I believe being a big woman has given me an amazing career, it has always separated me out from the pack. It didn't matter if I got older, I was always going to be a character actor. Being a writer has no age limit, but I also have all this experience of constantly being up against challenges and I know what to do."

She says that she doesn't mind fat jokes, but doesn't want them perpetrated on her. "I don't mind saying things about myself, I find funny. I don't feel that I am diminishing myself of anything. I feel it is a way of learning why we respond the way we do to things and a way of putting it out there so other people get comfortable."

However, Parker said she does not like cruel humour. Parker said she respects honesty in humour and believes if you take pain in your life and put it into the light, then it has no power over you.

She hopes Getting Waisted inspires people to be more of who they are intended to be just as they are. To enjoy their lives and stop focusing on the negative and finding the positive in who they are.

"Being Jewish has given me my lifelong love of food," admits Parker with a chuckle. "The activity known as a Jewish family dinner is volcanic. Everyone has an opinion, and everyone says it, all at one time. I would say that has added value to my humour."

Parker divides her time between Los Angeles and Toronto, where she continues to work in film and television. She was also the co-writer of the film All Dogs Go to Heaven.

In addition to touring her one-woman show, Parker just completed two features films. She has a recurring role in Defiance on the Sci-Fi channel, alongside her husband, actor and fashion designer, Gilles Savard. ■

Altshuller, Smoskowitz key to Generals' playoff push

plungen@thecjn.ca

Years ago, hockey coach Gene Ubriaco had this to say about the importance of goaltending to a team's success: "Goaltending is 75 per cent of hockey, unless you don't have any. Then, it's 100 per cent."

Truer words were never spoken, whether for the 1980s Pittsburgh Penguins, where Ubriaco was coach, or for the current edition of the Oshawa Generals.

The Generals finished first in the Eastern Division of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) and in the first round of the playoffs, swept the Mississauga Steelheads 4-0.

In the second round they kept the brooms out and swept the Peterborough Petes 4-0, winning the deciding game in overtime. Of the eight playoff games the Generals have played, three were shutouts posted by Nepean-born netminder Daniel Altshuller.

Altshuller has been pretty close to flawless. He's been in the Oshawa net for all eight wins, registering an impressive 1.50 goals against average (GAA) along with a .939 save percentage. Them's Carey Price numbers.

So far, Altshuller has been giving the Generals the kind of puck stopping that wins championships. He shut out the Petes in games one and two in Oshawa, and then in game three, despite a Peterborough push in which he was peppered with 37 shots, allowed only one goal. The Generals won 3-1 and Altshuller was named first star, as well as OHL Player of the Week for the week ending April 6. The Generals advanced to the OHL Eastern Conference finals.

His teammate, Dylan Smoskowitz, has been busy too, but not that busy. In the first eight OHL playoff games, he had two goals and three assists and was +2 on the stats sheet.

Pretty good, considering he could have been stretched out on a big La-Z-Boy recliner for round two, watching the games streaming on the Internet if not for a fortuitous mid-season trade.

Smoskowitz started the season with the Steelheads, where he played 40 games and recorded 20 goals and nine assists. He was traded to the Generals just before the trade deadline, giving him "the chance to play longer in the season," he said. He finished the year with 29 goals and 17 assists.

"I was so happy," he said just outside the dressing room at General Motors Centre in Oshawa. "It's not that I wanted to leave. I liked playing for Mississauga. The city loves the team." But the opportunity to play for a first-place team was too good to be true.

When he got to Oshawa, he was told the team was expecting him to do what he'd always done in junior and before – score some goals.

Smoskowitz, an overage junior who was undrafted, plays right wing on a line with Aiden Wallace and Joe Manchurek.

"We feed off each other," he said. "We all work down low and find the open holes for an opportunity to score."

He's seen some power play and penalty killing duties, as well.

The differences between the eighth-place Steelheads and first-place Generals are noticeable. "Every shift, there's no gliding. No waiting. It's 100 per cent, go, go, go. We play in-your-face hard-nosed hockey. That's the reason for our success," he said.

"We go to war for each other on a nightly basis."

"The whole team is playing well," said Altshuller, whose regular season GAA of 2.56 was fourth in the league. His .917 save percentage also placed him among top goalies in the OHL.

Clearly however, he's upped his game for the playoffs. "I expect that from my teammates and they expect the same out of me," he said.

Altshuller watches videos to learn the other team's shooting tendencies. He knows the Petes pretty well from matching up with them eight times during the regular season. They're good off the rush, their defencemen have heavy shots and they like to use the one-timer, he said.

Daniel Altshuller GOODALL MEDIA PHOTOS

Dylan Smoskowitz

For Altshuller, who was drafted by the Carolina Hurricanes in the third round of the 2012 NHL entry draft, "it's all about consistency. You have to be consistent in your movement so it becomes second nature.

"I try to play like Carey Price. That's the guy I try to imitate. He's patient and efficient in all his movements."

With the Generals closing out the series before Passover, Smoskowitz now has the chance to make the short trek down the 401 to his home in Richmond Hill for the first seder.

Altshuller, who signed a three-year entry level contract with the Hurricanes earlier this season, will stick around Oshawa. Last year his billet family, who are Jewish, hosted a seder. This year, his mom has already filled his freezer with Passover delicacies.

Though Altshuller and Smoskowitz are teammates on the Generals, they came close to playing on the same team last summer as well. Both were recruited to play for Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Altshuller, rated the Canes' top goaltending prospect by Hockey's Future, was ready to go to Israel until he got the schedule for the Hurricane's rookie camp, which coincided with the tournament dates in Israel.

Smoskowitz did go and enjoyed every minute.

"It was an unbelievable experience, winning the gold medal for your country," he said.

He smiles broadly when describing getting off the bus at the rink in Metulla with an equipment bag full of hockey gear in 100 degree weather.

It was fun playing with guys he'd played with, and against, in Toronto growing up. And the looks on the faces of the Israeli kids when they watched the tournament games was something to see.

"The kids at the rink were really in awe when we played the United States or Ukraine, when they saw how fast the game was," he recounted.

"It was cool to be part of that."

"You're there for the hockey but you take in the land and all it has to offer. It was two weeks of pure enjoyment for me."■

HORROR: Dybbuks, zombies and vampires

"You don't automatically think of horror films when discussing a Jewish film and what's at a Jewish film festival," Hands says. "But there's been a lot of scholarship related to Jewish horror, lately."

Hands and Koven spoke last summer about making a program devoted to scary movies. Hands had read an essay Koven wrote on his blog about this cinema, entitled "Golems, Dybbuks and other Movie Monsters: The Search for a Jewish Horror Film."

In the article, Koven writes about how many horror films that are directed, written or produced by Jews focus on a Christian-centric story. For instance, William Friedkin directed The Exorcist, a film that deals explicitly with Christian elements.

"In order to be considered a Jewish horror movie... it has to occupy a Jewish cosmos," Koven tells The CJN. "It has to be a mythology that puts Jews at the centre rather than Christianity."

In his essay, he writes about Jewish characters standing on the fringes of a Christian-centric world in horror classics like An American Werewolf in London. In horror cinema, Jewish characters are often outsiders from the community.

The story of Frankenstein's monster draws back to Judaism, as well, since it recalls folklore about the golem, a creature made from clay that is brought to life. In several versions of this story, the golem is responsible for protecting the Jewish community from attacks.

"The real monster in that story is the doctor who defies God," Koven explains. "If we consider these stories to be golem stories, this is man's hubris in trying to create life where we shouldn't, which is why it becomes monstrous."

Israel is also beginning to release very popular horror films. One of them is Goldberg & Eisenberg, a dark psychological thriller that will screen as part of Koven's program.

"Now, with the technology being such as it is, you don't need state money to make a film," Koven says. "That's allowing [Israeli] filmmakers, those fans who are dedicated to the horror genre, to do things their way."

Hands says that from the films in the TJFF program, he is most excited to watch Roman Polanski's 1967 horror parody The Fearless Vampire Killers with an audience. Meanwhile, Larry Cohen, director of God Told Me To, will be present for a Skype Q&A after a screening of his 1976 horror classic.

Another high-profile title from the program is The Dybbuk, an English-language adaptation of Sholom Ansky's play of the same name. Sidney Lumet (Dog Day Afternoon, 12 Angry Men) directs that 1960 film version.

Variations of the dybbuk story – where a spirit possesses one's soul and tempts them away from a righteous path – have also appeared in many contemporary American horror films, such as The Unborn and The Possession.

Organizers of the TJFF have been trying to screen more horror films over the last few years, Hands says. Although the horror audience is outside the core demographic of the festival, recent screenings of Israeli genre films like Rabies and Poisoned drew big crowds.

Poisoned features IDF soldiers turning into zombies, blending genre elements with a political subject matter. Hands says that the growth of horror cinema in Israel is tied to filmmakers reacting to vengeance and violence in Israeli society.

"With genre films, you're allowed to communicate and critique in a way that's a bit disarming," Hands says. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Ask Ella: When worlds collide

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

I've been dating Ben for over six months, and we've fallen in love. It's time for our parents to meet and I'm very nervous, as our families couldn't be more different. My dad works in the sports world. He's around men's locker rooms, and abrasive conversation is part of his personality. Ben's family is traditional and fairly observant, where everything is polite and formal. I see disaster ahead!

Worlds Collide

Dear Worlds Collide,

Your two families already share some kind of harmony. They have produced two human beings who have found enough common ground between them to have fallen in love.

Let's just get one thing straight: even if your families had come from the same background, neighbourhood etc., you would still be nervous, because this meeting is so very important to you. You've built up this incredible disaster in your mind without giving the parties involved much credit.

What you haven't realized is that, in a way, both sides already know a bit about what to expect. Every time you told your dad an anecdote about Ben and you, or mentioned his parents in any way, your dad drew a mental image of them. The same is true for Ben and his parents.

When your dad meets Ben's parents for the first time, it won't be in a sports locker room. Give him some credit to know when to turn off that gruff language and be respectful.

Brief your dad about Ben's family and their lifestyle. He knows how important this day is for you. Do you really think he doesn't want to make a good impression?

At the same time, Ben should set the scene at his end. Make sure his parents know a bit about your background and your dad's profession. There's nothing wrong with prepping everyone so that there are no surprises. Believe me, all involved want to make a good impression – that's just human nature.

If everyone came from the same place, we would be living on a pretty boring planet. You and Ben can get the conversation started and then just let it take off. Take a deep breath and relax. Trust that your families love you enough to understand the importance of making this meeting work.

Dear Ella,

A dear friend of mine just spent a fortune to make herself look younger. Unfortunately, I couldn't contain my shock when she strutted into my home yesterday. She truly looks odd. Everything on her face is over-defined and looks wrong. I can't get over it, and my facial expression didn't lie. Why do people do this to themselves?

Cosmetic Surgery Gone Wrong

Dear Cosmetic Surgery Gone Wrong,

You don't have a right to judge what pushes someone into making a decision to do a little nip and tuck. It's their body, their mind, their life.

At the same time, you're entitled to your feelings, but keep in mind that she can't undo what she's done at this point. It's not like disliking a dress and returning it for a better fit.

Perhaps plastic surgery is not for you. It certainly isn't for everyone, but most people certainly do everything they can to retain their youthful appearance using creams, facials, spas treatments.

Of course, the most drastic step is reconstruction. There are so many ways to look younger without resorting to that last step. Simple things such as smiling, walking with confidence, keeping your hair coiffured and your clothes fitting well and updated. Sleep, relaxation, exercise and not smoking also goes a long way, but in the end, time will begin to show.

Don't be embarrassed or upset about those lines, because each and every one represents your life. Your triumphs and tragedies, your children and grandchildren.

You should wear those lines with pride. You earned every one of them, and in my opinion, they should not be erased from time. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

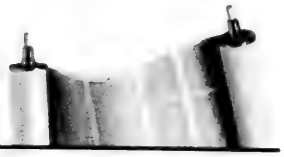
Parshah

Kedoshim | Leviticus 19:1 20:27



Rabbi Ilan Acoca reveals two different views of the meaning of kedushah
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl on a religious life defined by polarities
Rabbi Catharine Clark implores us to treat all Jews as holy

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Parashat Kedoshim starts with a startling statement commanding us to be holy.

I often ask myself, what is kedushah (holiness)?

Rashi and the Ramban have different views in their understanding of the concept of kedushah.

Rashi interprets kedushah as separation from anything that is prohibited. The Ramban's interpretation is that we are responsible for elevating the mundane to a spiritual level. By doing so, he says, a person will reach the level of kedushah.

I believe that as human beings, we have to ensure that, as we elevate ourselves, we cannot separate ourselves from the rest of the world. We have to be confident in our beliefs and come to the level of the people, understanding where they are coming from and bringing meaning into their lives.

It is a known fact that our chachamim, our sages, exemplified this idea.

Chacham Haim Palagi (1788-1869), who was the chacham bashi, the chief rabbi, of Izmir writes in his book Moed Lekol Hai that his grandfather, Chacham Yosef Refael Ben Haim Hazan instituted an edict against buying eggs during the month of Nisan because eggs were affordable, making it feasible for the entire community to buy them for Pesach.

The merchants realized this, and elevated the price of eggs during the month of Nisan, bringing sorrow to the less fortunate people who could not afford them. The chacham respected his people's dignity by stating that no one could buy eggs during the month of Nisan.

The chacham had great vision. He understood the pain of his flock and put himself in their shoes. He did not sit in his office or home, oblivious to his surroundings, but rather he taught the message of kindness and sensitivity to Am Yisrael, the nation of Israel.

Let us all take the example of Chacham Hazan and bring God's message closer to our nation. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

My teacher, Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, taught that the Torah tradition expresses significant ideas as polarities: awe and love of God, justice and mercy, transcendence and immanence. His books, God in Search of Man and Man's Quest for God, articulate the dynamic polarity of the religious-spiritual experience.

The Torah and haftorah readings for Kedoshim express a similar dynamism between the transcendent Creator who embraces all existence and the intimate relationship of God with the People of Israel.

"You shall be holy" (Leviticus 19:2) is the imperative that begins this weekly section. It is directed to the entire People of Israel, summoning them to distinguish themselves from others through ritual and ethical conduct. It is an aspiration, calling us to follow the mitzvah mandates of Leviticus and the other four books of the Torah.

Earlier in the Torah, just prior to the encounter at Sinai, the covenantal ideal was articulated: "You shall be my particular treasure from among all people… a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exodus 19:5-6).

Yet the prophetic reading from Amos tells us: "You are like the Ethiopians to me… Have I not brought up the Israelites from Egypt, the Philistines from Caphtor and Aram from Kir" (Amos 9:7)? Other people have experienced the transition from slavery to freedom. God has created all people and cares for them all.

My religious life is defined by a similar polarity. I am placed on this planet, which I share with all humanity, concerned for its environmental and social sustainability. I am also a passionate Jew, committed to the land and people of Israel, as well as to the mores and mitzvot (Shabbat and festivals, kashrut and daily prayer) of our covenant.

The rabbis who organized our liturgical calendar were wise to bring together the voices of priest and prophet, Leviticus and Amos. We are continually challenged to listen and live up to these twin ideals that point us toward a holy life. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

Five times in Leviticus laws are given to the Israelites. Parshat Kedoshim, however, begins by specifying that the laws that follow should be given to the entire community of Israelites (Leviticus, 19:2). Many commentators have questioned what makes these laws so special that they must be given to the entire community all at the same time. For most other laws, various groups of Israelites were taught separately.

Rashi, quoting Torat Kohanim, gives one common answer to this question. According to him, the entire community must be together to hear these laws because most fundamental principles of the Torah depend on it. Nechama Leibowitz, the 20th-century Bible scholar, objects to this answer – if these laws are so important, they should have been taught to each group of Israelites separately to maximize understanding.

Another reading is to connect the emphasis on giving the laws to the entire community with the rest of the verse which states, "You shall be holy, for I, the Lord your God, am holy." In this understanding, we are holy only when the entire community understands each other as holy.

This approach is not an easy one, but it is well worth pursuing. Imagine a Jewish community in which women who wrap tfillin are not impugned as egotists, and in which Chassidim are not dismissed as meshugene.

Without considering what you think other Jews need to do to treat you as holy, think about what you need to do to treat all Jews as holy. For instance, do you need to stop regarding parents who send their children to Jewish day schools as unable to recognize the value of a multicultural society? Or, do you need to stop thinking of parents who choose supplemental Jewish education for their children as Jewish lightweights? Do your part to create a Jewish community of holiness for all Jews. ■

The grandest hotel in the east

NANCY WIGSTON

Wes Anderson's The Grand Budapest Hotel recently charmed filmgoers with a nostalgic look at the glory days of a mythical grand hotel in an unnamed country. Travellers in search of a genuine grand hotel experience can still discover special hostelries that deserve the appellation "grand." One such gem is the Eastern and Oriental Hotel, in George Town, Penang, Malaysia, sister hotel to The Raffles in Singapore and The Strand in Yangon.

Amid the island's tropical heat and lively cultural scene, the E&O – as it's always referred to – looms elegantly at 10 Farquhar Street, an oasis of elegance and calm since 1885. Its new extension, the Victory Annexe, is a colonial-themed five-star establishment, but for historical hotel buffs, the original wing (restored in 1996) is the place to stay.

Entering the marble lobby with its interior dome, bouquets of fresh flowers, and welcoming staff effectively closes the door on the world outside. We're home. Some visitors may feel more at home than others, naturally. London architect Ben Grand, born in Penang in 1935, used to visit the hotel when his parents took him here for a haircut. For three E&O visits running, we've chatted with Ben and his wife Ria, as we sun by a pool tucked in an enclave symbolically guarded by two cannons from Fort Cornwallis, a 1788 British fortification.

On a recent February morning the Star, a local tabloid, carried a story ("Keeping the Jewish Heritage Alive in George Town") featuring the visit of Abraham Jacobs, a 90-year-old former fighter pilot, who left Penang 40 years ago, but returns each year to pay his respects at the Jewish cemetery, resting place of both his father and eldest son.

"It's like paying respects during qing ming," the Star quoted Jacobs as saying as he swept the graves – a reference to an annual Chinese festival of "tomb-sweeping."

The Jewish cemetery's oldest gravestone dates back almost 180 years, with the burial of Mrs Shoshan Levi who died on July 9, 1835. Three years ago, David "Mordy" Mordecai, longtime and much-loved general manager of the E&O, was laid to rest here, the last of Penang's resident Jewish community.

"We all went to his funeral," says Loh-Lim Lin Lee, who, with her architect husband, Lawrence Loh, is renowned for the passionate restoration of Penang's heritage properties, especially the Cheong Fatt Tze or "Blue Mansion," on Leith Street, not far from the E&O.

This Penang landmark, a former tin millionaire's home, is now an upscale bed and breakfast and appears on everyone's must-see Penang list for its rare Chinese art motifs and perfect feng shui.

Founded by the English, Penang has a population today that's largely Hokkien-speaking Chinese, but the former Free State's original cultural mix included Armenians, Jews, South Indians, Malays, Thais, Burmese, Eurasians and a unique group called Peranakan (baba-nonya), formed by intermarriage. This unique subculture has its own distinctive customs, dress and cuisine.

The Jews are visitors now. The old synagogue is a photography studio. The community's last representative, David Mordecai, was fondly called "Uncle Mordy" by Ben Grand, although he was in fact a second cousin. In the lobby of the E&O's new wing, we discover the hotel's museum, a treasure trove of memories of glory days, when everyone who could afford it celebrated their special occasions at the E&O. Three-year-old Ben is there, in one of many vintage photos. His father was also Penang-born (the family originally came from Austria) and he married a woman of Iraqi Jewish descent, achieving success as the agent for Phillips radios, until the postwar Communist insurgency cut him off from his clients for five long years.

Like so much of the island, the E&O was created by newcomers. It was the brainchild of four Armenian brothers, the Sarkies, who built their hotel overlooking the Straits of Malacca. It boasted a fancy dining room, a bar, and a ballroom. Naturally British high teas were served (they still are). The stone sea wall, at 275 metres, was the longest in the world. When the youngest Armenian brother, bon vivant Arshak, took over, the E&O had few rivals.

The hotel not only attracted colonials – rubber planters and the like – in search of an elegant evening, but also travelers such as writer Hermann Hesse, who called the E&O "the most beautiful hotel for Europeans that I came across in the East Indies." Noel Coward – inspired by his colonial travels to write Mad Dogs and Englishmen – famously appeared on the E&O terrace in his silk tennis whites. Joseph Conrad, Somerset Maugham and Rita Hayworth were also among the legendary guests. Booker winner Peter Carey is a big fan of Penang.

Hot and bustling, George Town is so rich in history that in 2008 it was awarded (along with Melaka), UNESCO World Heritage status. Its warren of charming streets, wealth of British colonial architecture Chinese clan houses, jetties, and temples – together with what's been called the best street food on the planet – has made the city a tourist favourite. The UNESCO designation has lately led to an infusion of chic: coffee houses, a camera museum and high-end eateries. ■

Rabbi Issamar Ginzberg: Living in two worlds

DAVID LAZARUS
dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Brooklyn-born Jerusalem resident Rabbi Issamar Ginzberg, 34, a chassidic rabbi, is a "strategic business adviser." He is invited to speak before corporate honchos, including Google and Yahoo, consults with business entrepreneurs and politicians, and pens a weekly column for The Jerusalem Post. He met recently with The Canadian Jewish News in Montreal.

How would you explain exactly what you do?

I teach people how to apply proven psychological principles and proven marketing techniques from the off-line world and update them to the online world, such as social media. I provide them with a new way of thinking about everything they've been doing using principles like consistency, authority, reciprocity, and others. The more elements you can put into everything you do, the more successful you will be.

But what is unique about how you do that as opposed to others?

I never use PowerPoint, just a screen and a Magic Marker. I try to convey concepts. I don't talk about tools, how to use this or that, but about things like how to use social media. There's a quote I really like: "social media is only free if time has no value." Some people think they don't have to advertise and they then spend four months on social media to earn $50. They get so excited and think that social media works. But what does that work out to, a nickel an hour? So I explain how to use social media profitably, about who belongs there and who doesn't.

Are there other haredim who do this type of thing, who are strategic business advisers for both Jews and non-Jews?

There are other "Jewish stars" in the business world, but from a purely business standpoint, I have not come across [another haredi who is invited to consult on business with non-Jews]. I use my picture in my logo and I write "Rabbi Ginzberg." It is not because I need the rabbi "kovod." It's so people know what I look like before I get there. I don't want that major surprise. And when I start, they stop looking at what I look like and start hearing things that makes sense.

Do you think you are ever perceived as being this "exotic" figure doing a presentation for non-Jews?

Rabbi Issamar Ginzberg

> I teach people how to apply proven psychological principles and proven marketing techniques from the off-line world and update them to the online world, such as social media

When you have a guy who's a principal at [the computer technology company] Oracle, a guy with a $2 billion company on the New York stock exchange, endorsing me, writing testimonials for me, it's not seen as a circus. It's more like you can be a chassidic Jew and still make it, a role model kind of thing.

How did a Brooklyn boy from a chassidic family end up speaking to movers and shakers at Google?

I don't really know how this all happened is the real answer. I was at a bar mitzvah in 1998 and I met somebody who was advising public companies on marketing. He didn't have any formal training. I realized after speaking with him that there was money to be made here. I was 19 when I first did business consulting. I always had an entrepreneurial spirit. My parents encouraged me very much. I sold jellybeans in third grade. I was born with the ability to take some random piece of knowledge and use it someplace in a very amazing way.

What has recognition been like for you?

The reason HaShem gave me these talents is so I can do this. It's not true chassidic Jews are out there begging for handouts. There are plenty of hardworking chassidic people who work very hard to make a living. But you don't see that. You only see newspapers talking about the poverty line, and too many children.

When did you first realize you had this talent?

I always wanted to make money. When I was 15, a friend of my brother's had a shirt company and gave me a job packing shirts, and he mentioned that he wanted a new shirt brand so I went home and made him a brand, with the logo and packaging and whole thing, and he paid me three hours, the same rate as if I was packing shirts. So I didn't make much money on the deal, but that was probably my first real entry into retail. I also made shareware [software] for the Macintosh computer custom icons, which got me into Mac Addict magazine.

You were that good with computer technology?

Yes. My father invented the first Hebrew font for Mac.

Why is there the perception that within the haredi world, the use of computers is discouraged?

The use of computers in the home is [discouraged], not in business. What we're saying is that if you're in a home, with children around, and Wi-Fi everywhere, if you want to protect your children from [the corrupting influence] of computers, that's what you do.

How did your career evolve from the shareware?

When I did the shareware, I would get cheques from all over the world and one of the cheques was from Apple. I came up with this concept that I would charge $10 [to license the shareware for] one computer and $35 for an entire company. I did it as a novelty to make things look more professional. When companies started to send me $35 for the rights to use my icons, I realized: wow, the Internet can help you, and second, that you never know where things can lead, and if you give people two options, some people are going to choose the more expensive option. That was a major Aha!

How did that lead to speaking at Google?

One thing led to another. I'm comfortable meeting people and networking in general. One of the things I do is see how to build a story of a brand and how to communicate it to the media. I ended up speaking for an organization called the Israel Translators Association about four or five years ago. I knew when I spoke there that these people had no real money, but one of the people listening was a Tel Aviv University teacher who had lectured at Google Israel. She went to Google and told them about me. So one day I get an email from Google inviting me to speak. Now there's a picture of me kissing the mezuzah at Google. I thought to myself, even if my speech really flops, I got the picture. It was at this presentation that I knew the cognitive dissonance of a chassidic rabbi and Google together would help this brand and would help my reputation.

Do you prefer consulting with individuals or corporations?

I prefer dealing with entrepreneurial people, people who are interested in their own future instead of being a little cog in a big wheel.

In business and advertising, you often hear about how important it is to "brand" a product. What do you think about branding?

Advertising for small businesses has to be targeted, to get a response from every ad. You cannot bombard people with advertising or shove it down their throats. You should be educating them. It's because they read something about it that has actual value to them. If they want to reach out, it's from their own free will, not because it's being shoved down their throats. I don't believe in branding in the sense that the people who spend three months on a logo and then three months on a website think they have a company. They don't have a company. They have a logo and a website that hasn't done any business. Marketing is not branding, advertising is not branding. It's just not. ■

Departures to Montreal: Jews from Arab lands

Backstory

YOLANDE COHEN

In the three decades following World War II, almost all the Jews from the Maghrib (North Africa) and Machrek (the Middle East) left the countries where they had been living for centuries. Mapping the specifics of this exodus has led to several findings, and questions remain as to how this displacement occurred and how the individual and collective stories of displacement contribute to the construction of a new set of narratives for Sephardi Jews settled in Montreal.

The departures have been set against the backdrop of the ongoing humiliation attached to the Jews' status as "dhimmi" that is, an ethno-religious minority recognized as a legitimate religious community, but one subordinated under Islamic law to the Muslim majority.

Historian Michel Abitbol explains the departures as the result of the establishment of the European colonial empire in the 19th century in the countries involved. In its wake, Jews were invariably led to abandon their traditional ways of life and leave their countries of birth to follow the promise of emancipation. The form taken by their departures depended in large part on the nature of the conflicts opposing the colonial powers in the Muslim majority.

Coerced or not, the departure of Jews from the Maghrib-Machrek occurred in a different context in each country. The displacement of Jews from Egypt is especially striking. Of the 50,000 Jews living in Egypt before World War II, 40,000 left the country in 1956-1957, and another 5,000 departed by 1967. Many factors were at play in the disappearance of Egypt's Jewish community, including its members being stripped of their citizenship, making them stateless.

In North Africa, the migration of Maghribi Jews took place after the violence of colonization and during the process of decolonization. The feeling of insecurity was the context within which their departure occurred.

In recent research, Martin Messika, Sara Cohen Fournier and I, conducted, in-depth interviews with Montréal Jews, and found that their departure from Arab-Muslim lands was fuelled by political and memorial issues. Comparing the migrations from Machrek and those from Maghrib sheds light on two types of displacement.

In the first case, departure is perceived as an expulsion. Strong emotions are still present in recollections of the events. Fear and angst within the narratives reveal a possible sense of insecurity about the present, as well as a continuation of their anger that could affect a possible reconciliation with their own past. Hence, it becomes essential to try to identify the factors of denial or forgetting. This aspect is a central element in some of the interviews we conducted, and some of the interviewees who came from Machrek, particularly those from Egypt or Iraq, emphasized the forced dimension of their departure.

In the second case, that of the Maghrib, most interviewees professed that their departure stemmed from their own will, or was linked to another aspect of their lives (familial or professional) that had no relationship to any form of coercion. Indeed, the situation of Jews in Morocco was entirely different from that of Jews in Egypt. Moroccan independence in 1956 did not lead to discriminatory measures concerning Jewish Moroccan nationality.

The conflicting memories between voluntary or forced displacements of Jewish populations from the Maghrib-Machrek, although largely connected to the specifics of national histories, are thus embedded in a larger history of conflict between the religious majority (Arab-Muslims) and the minority (the Jews), which came to a head with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The post-Shoah and post-colonial contexts have raised this issue to its most extreme level: Jews as the ultimate victim.

Paradoxically, during much of the five decades since their first departure from Arab-Muslim countries, our interviewees wished to erase this history and its image of victimization and replace it with a plurality of stories, more typical of post-colonial, free-floating migrations.

The ability to become the agent rather than the victim of events legitimizes departure as a collectivity. This narrative enables departees to construct and reconstruct their history, and to show themselves as adaptable. If it undermines certain emotions that have been collectively ignored or marginalized and that remain conflicted within individuals' inner lives, the construction of a global historical narrative that includes their frustration and residual fear, as well as their fond memories of their past, is now what could allow reconciliation between the individual's past and the group's history. ■

WHO IS A JEW? THE NEW HEAD OF FORD MOTORS, THAT'S WHO

Jewish grandchild for Bill and Hillary?

News that Chelsea Clinton and her Jewish husband Marc Mezvinsky are expecting their first child triggered much debate whether the first grandchild of former U.S. president Bill Clinton and presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton will be Jewish. Reform and Reconstructionist Jews would recognize matrilineal descent if the child was raised as a Jew, while the Orthodox and Conservative movements would require a conversion. Meanwhile, the anti-Semitic website Stormfront made it clear where it stands with the headline: "Chelsea Clinton pregnant with Jew spawn." Nice.

Will Chelsea Clinton's baby be part of the tribe? Discuss.

Henry Ford might do backflips

Ford Motor Co. is reportedly set to name its Jewish COO, Mark Fields, as the successor to CEO Alan Mullaly, 68, who is credited with turning around the struggling automaker and steering it successfully through the recession without government assistance since taking over in 2006. Mullaly is said to be planning to retire at the end of the year. Fields, 53, has been COO of Ford since 2012 and is widely seen as his replacement. One wonders what Ford's founder, notorious anti-Semite Henry Ford, would think about a Jew heading his company. Of course, today in Detroit, Ford and the Ford family are major contributors to Jewish causes, and members of the family and top executives have been honoured by Jewish groups.

Israeli tourism hums along

Israel continues to be a tourism magnet, despite ongoing efforts to isolate the Jewish state. After a record year in 2013, during which 3.54 million tourists visited the country, the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto reports that 284,000 tourists arrived in Israel in March, a 13 per cent increase over the same time last year and a new all-time high. The number includes 6,330 Canadians, a 12 per cent increase over last year and also a record. Overall, more than 700,000 tourists have come to Israel so far this year, 17 per cent more than last year at this time. ■

Setting the Israel trap

Adam Goldenberg laid the Israel trap, baited it, and then fell in himself ("The Israel trap," The CJN, April 17). Jews are the same as all Canadians, even though the anti-Semites do not believe it.

Canadian Jews put Canada first, and if Prime Minister Stephen Harper does Canada harm, they will not vote for him, regardless of his support of Israel.

Murray Rubin
Toronto

Harper does not speak for all

Michael Taube ("Canadian Jews will remain in the Tory camp," The CJN, April 17) claims that "Jewish values and Tory values have a great deal in common." If he is right, then I am ashamed to be Jewish.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative values include defunding charitable and social service organizations, attacking many honourable, dedicated public servants with false libel claims, denying and suppressing rational, scientific evidence, ignoring democratic votes, stonewalling criminal and judicial inquiries, subverting the institutions of parliamentary democracy, and using public funds lavishly to reward partisan supporters and to pay for partisan activities.

And, oh yeah, uncritical support of Israel, whatever its human, fallible government might say or do. No government, not Harper's, not Israel's, deserves mindless, uncritical support from an entire community.

My own Jewish values ensure that I will never support the Harper Conservatives.

Elaine Bander
Montreal

Peace talks doomed

The CJN's April 10 editorial, "Where do peace talks go from here?" argues that U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry is "completely ineffective" and suggested that President Barack Obama find a new diplomatic mediator, and it questions whether Obama "has the fortitude to orchestrate" a peace agreement.

The editorial pinned blame for the current impasse on Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas because he does not comprehend reciprocity.

How can Abbas accept a "Jewish homeland" with no boundaries? To where – the Euphrates River? Because, according to our Israeli religious Jewish zealots, who are dictating the turn of events on behalf of the moderate majority, the border is open-ended and Israel can gingerly manage the conflict.

These are the facts: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu (and Knesset parliamentarians to his political right) have consistently resisted a peace process for decades, which would acknowledge the borders of 1967 with minor territorial exchanges; sharing the capital of Jerusalem for both Jews and Muslims; and resolving the issue of compensation for Palestinian refugees.

And lastly, can you tell us which U.S. president or secretary of state including their envoys reached diplomatic success with the mighty "Teflon" Netanyahu?

Smadar Meiri
Thornhill, Ont.

Disputed vs. Occupied

For the second time recently, Bernie Farber has continued using "occupied" territory rather than "disputed" territory ("Two-state solution: nightmare or reality?" The CJN, April 10).

Israel is not the "occupier" of the West Bank. Instead of "West Bank," he should call it what it is, Judea and Samaria.

As far as the Arab birthrate exceeding the Jewish birthrate, this is a fallacy. The Jewish birthrate now exceeds the Arab birthrate, and the chances of their becoming a larger population are questionable.

Ian Franklin

Don't mess with the plan

Kudos to Joannie Tansky for celebrating having been created a Jewish woman, with all of our awesome rights and responsibilities, instead of whining for not having been created a Jewish man ("Let's be the best Jewish women we can be," The CJN, April 3). The Creator of all living beings knows what He is doing, so why try to mess with His plan.

FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: One of my earliest memories in my role as a congregational rabbi is my very first funeral. At that point in life, I had attended very few funerals, and now I was expected to take charge, to help the mourners through their grief. Somehow I overcame my sense of cosmic inadequacy, got through the service, satisfied the family's needs and settled into what would become a major piece of my congregational rabbinate.

My entire three-plus decades in the rabbinate have been based in one congregation. I have named babies whose mothers I had also named, and on many occasions, have witnessed the fulfilment of the prayer recited at a baby naming when those babies, having grown into adulthood, have stood under the chupah. But longevity in a congregation has its sadder moments as well, as those who were in middle age and at their intellectual peak when I arrived, reach old age and infirmity. Losses in the congregation, as time passes, have become more personal.

Rabbi Finegold: I always assumed that pulpit rabbis were generalists, akin to GPs in medicine, who knew how to do enough of everything to be the go-to person for everything Jewish in a community. My role, on the other hand, was to be a specialist, the person who is contracted to help congregations take their Jewish learning to the next level.

Do you think that this difference might be denominational? Are there fewer halachic queries in Conservative Judaism and a bigger emphasis on rituals that move us from one phase of life to another? Are there parts of your training that are underutilized?

Rabbi Scheim: True, my most meaningful memories of my rabbinate are life cycle related. It is in these interactions with families at their moments of greatest vulnerability (simchahs as well as sadness) that moments of greatest meaning are achieved. But you are correct in assuming that a congregational rabbi is somewhat of a GP, because we do a lot of different things, which for me, was the attraction.

My regret is not that aspects of my training are underutilized, but rather, that the multiplicity of commitments my daily schedule entails limits my personal Torah Lishmah my own study of Torah for its own sake (literally, for its name), not in connection to sermon or class preparation. I know that this lament is shared by many congregational rabbis.

Rabbi Finegold: While I empathize with your regret, I find my specialty containing Torah Lishmah in it as its greatest strength. I find there is no better way to learn something than to learn it well enough to teach it.

Sadly, many people do not see this as an important value. Sometimes I wonder if communal rabbis could be better allies. In my experience, many rabbis are too busy to develop high quality adult education programming in their congregations, and even those that do, usually deplete the interests and specialities they developed in rabbinical school within a few years and begin to recycle them. I wish more rabbis would begin to use specialists to bring robust programming to their congregations, and use the pulpit to address the value of lifelong learning.

Rabbi Scheim: Ideally, a full-time rabbi/educator who specializes in adult learning would be part of a synagogue staff. I would welcome such a hiring, as would the vast majority of my colleagues, but tight synagogue budgets usually preclude such appointments.

I am not sure we have confronted the consequences of the pace of technological change in today's world. Will millennials attend classes in the synagogue, no matter how inspiring and how erudite they may be, when their leisure world is centred on Facebook and Twitter?

Rabbi Finegold: I actually think you underestimate so-called millenials. They are, after all, the segment of our population that have most recently left universities. They are the most used to sitting in a lecture and learning from a teacher.

As an educator, my takeaway from seeing so many Jewish learning resources online is that none of them are really about the medium. While I agree with Marshall McLuhan about the medium being the message, looking at the content of these sites, I am struck by the depth of learning that they convey to the user. My drash on McLuhan is that great messages often gravitate to the best medium available. ■

A look back at Israel's 66th year

With Yom Ha'azmaut just a few days away, this week The CJN looks back on the state of Israel's 66th year in existence. It's been a busy 12 months, punctuated by some truly major political and social events that could very well alter Israeli history forever.

The ultra-Orthodox conscription law is a fitting example. The bill, which terminated many of the draft exemptions that traditionally allowed haredim to avoid army service, presents a prime opportunity to incorporate the ultra-Orthodox into greater Israeli society. The question now is how many will accept the invitation.

While the haredi community fulminated against assimilation, African migrant workers gathered in Tel Aviv to demand integration, pleading with the government to address asylum requests. Foreign Ministry employees took issue with their situation, too, going on strike for better pay, while the Women of the Wall's demonstrations for recognition finally appeared on the way to achieving a desirable outcome, with the creation of a new egalitarian section at the Kotel. And actress Scarlett Johansson dealt a blow to the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement when she stood up for SodaStream.

The year also included a healthy dose of Canadian content: Prime Minster Stephen Harper made his first state visit to Israel, where he was welcomed as a loyal friend. Many, though certainly not all, Canadian Jews feel the same. Meanwhile, Israelis got a taste of our winter when a brutal storm blanketed the country in snow last December.

Two men who played crucial roles in Israel's trajectory passed away in the last 12 months: Sephardi spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef on Oct. 7, and former prime minister Ariel Sharon on Jan. 11. In death, as in life, both were praised and pilloried.

But, of course, the biggest story was the peace process (or lack thereof) with the Palestinians. Negotiations began in July, with Israel agreeing to release 104 Palestinian prisoners and the Palestinian Authority committing not to seek international recognition for a state. Neither side fulfilled its promise, and the talks stalled.

If there was any hope the two sides could be brought back to the table in the near term, it vanished last week when the PA announced a unity agreement with Hamas. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu responded by doing the only thing he could: suspending peace negotiations.

On Saturday, PA President Mahmoud Abbas told reporters the new Palestinian unity government would be composed of technocrats rather than Fatah and Hamas officials, though it's difficult to envision how party politics won't seep into the government – if it is ever constituted, which is far from a given. Abbas also promised the government would recognize Israel, but if Hamas is involved, even remotely, how could anyone trust him?

And, in any case, Abbas also reiterated Saturday that the Palestinians will never recognize Israel as a Jewish state. One hopes he and his people can be convinced to change their minds, or that some future Palestinian leader will adopt a different approach, because otherwise there is no hope for a peace deal, in Israel's 67th year or beyond. Failing to recognize Israel's inherent Jewishness is akin to not recognizing Israel at all. There is no difference. ■ – YONI

The great switch

Danielle Kubes

No one was surprised when Eglinton-Lawrence Tory MP Joe Oliver, with his long list of Bay Street accomplishments, became finance minister in March.

The surprise was that Oliver managed to be elected MP of Eglinton-Lawrence in the first place.

To understand how a Tory was elected in a riding that had been Liberal since its creation in 1979 is to understand how Prime Minister Stephen Harper successfully targeted and captured the Jewish vote.

All of the four most Jewish ridings in Canada, according to recent census data – Thornhill, Eglinton-Lawrence and York Centre in Toronto and Mount Royal in Montreal – had been easy Liberal wins since their inceptions. But, starting with the 2008 election, many Jews who had always voted Liberal started putting an X in a different square on their ballots.

By the 2011 election, the great switch was on, with only Liberal MP Irwin Cotler retaining his Mount Royal seat, but by his slimmest margin yet.

It's strange, because Jews are liberal – cosmopolitan, concerned about social inequality and uninterested in what goes on in the bedrooms of the nation. Yet it's easy to see why many Jews paid so little attention to their convictions and crossed the floor. As former Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff writes in his political memoir, Fire and Ashes, only a single political question matters: "Is it good or bad for the Jews?"

Jews may possess other voting identities but like all minorities, they allow their ethnicity to move to the fore if they feel threatened. And Jews always feel threatened. The deepest and most neurotic Jewish fear is that we are David and the world is Goliath, and if we let our slingshot rest for a second, we will be crushed.

Harper zeroed in on this fear with a carefully crafted, two-part communication plan, positioning himself as the true defender and champion of Israel and setting up the Liberals as his foil.

Regarding the former, he did so mostly through loud rhetoric, with his most tangible action being changing the way Canada votes at the UN. The real-world effect on Israel is nil, but it's a show of support that's easy to feed to people starved of this sort of strident advocacy.

What actually helps Israel is Canadian foreign policy, which has remained unchanged since Harper took office.

The Department of Foreign Affairs website calls Israel an "occupying power" and refers to the territories captured in 1967, including east Jerusalem, as "occupied territories," and Canada continues to fund Palestinians generously.

Regarding the second part of his plan, Harper went on the offensive, and it's not to our credit that we fell for it so easily. It's our weakness that we're sensitive enough to see any space between praise and a pause as criticism.

In 2006, for example, the Tories mailed flyers to houses in Jewish ridings citing every scrap of out-of-context, half-factual information that implied the Liberals hated Israel. One bullet point on the flyer stated that the Liberals "willingly participated in the overtly anti-Semitic Durban I" UN anti-racism conference. The reference was to Cotler, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress whose daughter had served in the IDF and who told the Toronto Star he stayed at the conference as an observer at Israel's request.

Another bullet stating that "Michael Ignatieff accused Israel of committing war crimes" was true, although Ignatieff immediately retracted and amended his statement, which referred to Israel's bombing of Qana during the 2006 Lebanese conflict. Ignatieff writes of this blunder in Fire and Ashes: "I questioned whether a democratic state's legitimate rights entitled it to violate the laws of war. This shouldn't have been the issue. Why should a politician take it upon himself to rule on an embattled state's compliance with the Geneva Convention?"

Shhhhh Michael! This is politics – there's no room for measured comments on controversial issues – it's too confusing. Best to stick to talking points.

Harper and his communication team excel at staying on message. Notice that he and his ministers never stray from talking points but simply repeat short, simple phrases riddled with synonymous keywords such as "shared values" "allies" "friend" and "special relationship." The Liberals' official positions on Israel are equally supportive but they're less focused on making us believe it.

Harper's real political genius lies in how he presents his support of Israel as a passionate love affair – as authentic. We are blinded to his machinations, because we believe that Israel is the homeland of his heart. This may be true, but we must not forget that he's also a political animal, able to sniff out where votes are hiding.

And with only a few ridings short of a majority government in 2011, he saw opportunity in certain districts. A leaked document, titled Breaking through: Building the Conservative brand in cultural communities, explained exactly how the Tories planned to woo ethnic votes. As it said: "There are lots of ethnic voters. There will be quite a few more soon. They live where we need to win."

A bar graph displayed 10 targeted ridings: three were "Jewish," the others Chinese, South Asian and Ukrainian.

Readers should remember two things. One is that the Jewish population isn't too small to be courted for votes. Because of Canada's first-past-the-post system, a concentrated group of voters can become a tipping point that translates into seats. We became a tipping point.

Second, authenticity generally emerges by accident, like when York Centre MP Mark Adler begged to pose with Harper in front of the Western Wall this past January.

"This, it's the re-election," he said crassly, within range of a microphone. "This is the million-dollar shot." ■

OPINION

The social media dilemma

Sammy Unterman

Our smartphones and computers have opened up our world. With this comes the need to share information. Many of us upload the details of our lives to social networks like Facebook and Twitter on a regular basis. In a rapidly changing and often confusing world, our hand-held devices and computers may feel as if they keep us closer together, but many more people feel that connection than we care to believe.

It is becoming increasingly important to understand what information we share, how it is collected and what is done with it, and to take action to control what we share. Although you may believe your information is insignificant, the truth is that it is an important piece in the puzzle. By sharing some information, you may be doing yourself or others great harm.

We "check-in," sign up for events, share with the world what we like and dislike, and take photos. Every check-in shows the world where you are, and every event you sign up for shows where you are going to be and when. When compiled with all your personal information, this gives any wrong-doer a lot of information that can be used against you. In addition, did you know that every time you snap an image with your phone, not only is a time-stamp invisibly added, but also a geotag, which shows the exact GPS co-ordinates of where the image was taken? The image and data are then uploaded to your social network, and provide one more complete intelligence picture.

Any would-be terrorist with a laptop and a basic understanding of Internet security can go and collect this information and establish a high-value intelligence image in order to carry out an attack. For example, it is known that the Tsarnayev brothers who perpetrated the Boston bombings used Facebook and other social networks to collect and analyze intelligence, allowing them to be in the correct place and time to maximize damage. If a terrorist wanted to carry out an attack against Jews, a simple Facebook search would reveal a host of events, their patrons, locations and times. All that is left for them to do is buy or build a weapon and go into action.

Although it is incredibly difficult to remove information already put online, as much of our uploaded material has become property of the social media companies, what we can do is attempt to limit the future flow of information to these websites.

Here are some guidelines: 1) Don't be impulsive and quick to share everything. 2) Make sure to close the "share location" features of your gadgets and applications in order to stem the flow of vital location data. 3) If you want to share information about where you are going, try to be vague, especially about your itinerary. 4) Don't add people you don't know to your social networks. 5) Turn your online security settings to "maximum."

There are ways for terrorists to get around all of these functions, but by making it as difficult as possible to gather information, you are stemming many of the more amateur wannabe terrorists without the technological know-how.

In a world so controlled by the information we share online, a minimalist approach to personal sharing can go a long way. Protection of our information is rapidly becoming the most serious security issue. It is likely that much of your information has already been collected, sorted and analyzed by various state and sub-state organizations and groups. What is left to you is what you do with the information you have not yet uploaded.

There is no reason to stop using social networks. They are a great feat of modern technology and can help keep us all connected. What is of utmost importance is that we all think twice before sharing. The world is literally at our fingertips, but for Jews, protection and security of our most vital information must come first. ■

Dates are important if we want to remember

Dan Held

As a student, I spent a lot of time on Facebook. I'd skim my timeline, check out my "friends" walls, read the articles others posted, and generally snoop around other people's lives. When asked about the topic of my dissertation, I'd sometimes quip that I was studying Facebook.

Since beginning a new job in January, my Facebook time has been cut drastically. I triage my scarce time and focus on one area: birthdays. Facebook has created the infrastructure to remind me of important dates in the lives of my "friends" and I take advantage by posting a quick "happy birthday" or "like" whenever I see one pop up.

Dates are important, but of real significance is what lies behind them.

I often refer to this week of the Jewish calendar as the Yoms: Yom Hashoah, commemorating the Holocaust; Yom Hazikaron, remembering Israel's fallen soldiers; and Yom Ha'atzmaut, celebrating Israel's establishment. The three come in a convenient chronological, emotional and educational order.

In truth, however, the dates were manufactured as such. Yom Hashoah was established in 1953 by Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion. The commemoration could have been set on any number of dates, including Tisha b'Av, a traditional day of Jewish mourning; Nov. 9-10, marking Kristallnacht; or Jan. 27, the International Holocaust Remembrance Day marked on the anniversary of liberation of Auschwitz. The proposal was to hold Yom Hashoah on the 14th of Nisan, corresponding to the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, an important symbol of strength and defiance for a new state. With Passover starting on the 15th of Nisan, Yom Hashoah was set shortly after the holiday.

Similarly, Yom Hazikaron, was intentionally placed on the day preceding Yom Ha'atzamut. In the early years of the state, memorial services for fallen soldiers were held on Yom Ha'atzmaut. In order to separate memorial observances from the celebrations of independence, Yom Hazikaron was established the day prior.

It's only Yom Ha'atzmaut that falls on a true anniversary, usually. In a normal year, we celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut on the anniversary of the day Ben-Gurion stood in Tel Aviv and declared the state. When the anniversary falls on Shabbat, Friday, Sunday or Monday, we move the celebration to a more convenient day.

In truth, it's less the date that's important than the annual pause they command. Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron, and Yom Ha'atzmaut command our collective attention in powerful ways that ingrain their message in our collective memory. Without a date on the calendar, it would be easy for their significance to be missed.

For schools, the Yoms can be overwhelming. There's so little time between Passover and summer vacation that a week of assemblies could easily be brushed away. But they're not. Day and supplementary schools pause their curricula, tests and activities to bring home the varied messages of the days through speakers, plays, dances and ceremonies.

For families who see in warming weather the opportunity for the first trip of the season to the playground or the start of soccer league, the Yoms command a pause from the normal. I remember having a falafel dinner each year during elementary school on Yom Ha'atzmaut and going with my family to Yom Hazikaron ceremonies in high school.

For the community, it would be easier to hold one event in May or to shift our events away from the spring, with its allure of warm weather and budding trees, to indoor events in the winter. It would be easier to combine them with other community events, rallies and speakers, or the Walk with Israel, held a few weeks later. But we don't, and if we did, their message would be muffled. Throughout our community – in schools, shuls and JCCs – events are held to commemorate each of the Yoms.

Having a date on the calendar forces our active memory. Just as a birthday is less about the date and more about the person, and an anniversary is less about the wedding and more about the marriage, the actual date of the Yoms bears little significance if we use them as markers to pause, reflect, remember and celebrate. ■

What peace would really mean

Jean M. Gerber

I am deep into The Orenda by Joseph Boyden. It's a powerful and deeply disturbing read – as you'll find out if you tackle it yourself. But it's not the violence practised by the tribes at war, or even the racist and morally disfiguring attitude of the "crows" (Jesuits) that strike me. The novel's overriding theme for me was the inability of each group to realize the intentions of the other.

In alternating chapters, we hear the voices and inner thoughts of Bird (Huron) Snow Falls (Iroquois) and Crow, the Jesuit missionary they call charcoal, sent to convert the "sauvages" (his term.)

Snow Falls is the Iroquois captive of Bird. The two tribes have been bashing at each other for some time. Bird, the Huron leader, tries to understand his captive, while Snow Falls plots his destruction. Neither can perceive the inner thoughts of the other. Crow is obsessed with the souls of the Huron, and even after he learns enough of their language to preach to them, he continues to regard them as subhuman. His goal (happily achieved) is also martyrdom. His character is a construction based on accounts sent back to France by the early Jesuits in New France.

While the First Nations see the "charcoal" as helpful in trade, they never realize that what's at stake is the priests' basic intention to convert them – and serve as the first stage in taking control of French North America for the crown (not so godly an intention, that).

Between Jesuits and native there can be no understanding, beliefs and cultures simply cannot meet. It's irony with a violent and tragic twist. In the end Iroquois defeat Huron, who are driven away from their farming villages, dispersed among other related tribes. For the Jesuit priests in the novel, their end is pretty grim. But we know, living outside the novel, that priests and French settlers – and the English enemy as well – will ultimately be victors. Sickened by diseases and their lands overrun, First Nations will all be worse off. It's no accident that we're still dealing with the irony of misapprehensions.

Fast forward, or backward in this case. While giving an interfaith workshop years ago, my husband and I discussed a number of faith words with a Christian church group. It was amazing to all of us to realize how divergent our understandings were.

Take the word "redemption." For Jews, redemption is a community event involving all Jews: the final dawn of a messianic age. For Christians, redemption is a personal achievement after an experience of being born again. An actual person, a messiah, will bring the final apocalypse.

Now let's bring it home. This year has seen new efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Success would seem to hinge on a set of mutual political compromises and baby steps toward that. If only it were so simple.

It was so easy to imagine a Jewish state, a glorious rebuilding of the land, when Jews were stateless and barely recovered from the Holocaust. Battles with the Palestinians, terror attacks and hostility from surrounding Arab states were part of the heroic stance of the new Israeli.

But the real problem? Jew and Palestinian each had a story encapsulated in the word "exile" that pretty much excluded the other. For the new Israel, the word "exile" meant 2,000 years of Jewish Diaspora outside the Land of Israel, followed by hard-won return. There: job's done, and we're never going back.

No one else can be in exile, of course.

Except for the Palestinians: to them, exile means living in a current, cruel diaspora caused by the Jews of Israel. Same word, but with such divergent meanings.

So to achieve peace isn't to engage in a purely political settlement. It's not just a question of bits of land, payments, who did what to whom, where lines will be drawn, or who gets Jerusalem. If it were simply that, we all know the outline of the compromise. The crux is to untangle a web of internal meanings for each community. It didn't work for the Huron/Jesuit. Can it work for us? ■

The demoralizing faith of religious draft dodgers

James Diamond

During the year after my father's death, I used the Kaddish prayer as a recurring reminder to explore how other serious thinkers responded to catastrophe, particularly that which my father endured. The most remarkable I encountered are the sermons of Rabbi Kalonymous Kalman Shapira, the chassidic master known posthumously as the Warsaw Ghetto Rebbe. Published as The Holy Fire (Eish Kodesh), they were delivered in the Warsaw Ghetto between the fall of 1939 and the summer of 1942, when he was finally murdered, and are no less a heroic form of resistance than the armed uprising that has unfortunately monopolized the popular imagination since. They weren't simply flashes of virtuosic Torah learning, but intended rather to combat despair in desperate circumstances.

On the annual commemoration of my father's death, I revisited The Holy Fire and studied a sermon delivered in mid-March of 1942, one of the last before his deportation, on the occasion of his own father's yahrzeit. There he cites his father's teaching, which strikingly speaks to recent Israeli legislative efforts to redress the inequity of religious exemptions from military and national service. The Torah allows for limited exemptions from serving in battle, among which yeshiva students are conspicuously absent. Included are the "fearful and disheartened," or those too terrified to enter the theatre of war, who are discharged from active duty because their fear would demoralize the troops. The Talmud defines "fearful" as "afraid of his sins," meaning the potential conscript worries that his sins might render him vulnerable to injury or death on the battlefield.

Rabbi Shapira then zeroes in on the phrase "his sins" in contradistinction to one who has a fear of others' sins. In other words, this exemption targets only those whose devotion to God is self-centred. The one who fears only the consequences of his own sins reflects a sorely deficient religious life absent any compassion for others. The corollary is that those who fear both for their own and their comrades' in arms sins are not exempt, because they're precisely the ones who qualify best as warriors, since their concern for others is what's essential for the physical self-sacrifice that war so often entails.

When afforded the opportunity to escape from the ghetto, Rabbi Shapira refused to abandon his followers, sacrificing his own future to do whatever he could to sustain their bodies and spirits. In March 1942, when this sermon was delivered, starvation, disease, and death were the defining features of ghetto life.

Some 5,000 people died in the streets monthly, the deportations to liquidate the ghetto of its remaining living dead loomed, and, in a short while, Adam Czerniakow, the Jewish leader of the ghetto, would commit suicide at the prospect of having to provide the daily quota for those deportations. The rabbi himself was doomed. Yet, Rabbi Shapira persisted in his sermonic resistance, not because he feared his own sins, but because he feared for others and for the physical integrity of his people.

The only Torah category that could accommodate exemptions for haredim is "the fearful and disheartened." Claiming the exemption ironically qualifies them for membership in the group called haredim because of a "trembling" before God out of a fear that fails to extend beyond the self. That fear is symptomatic of an impoverished spiritual condition that disqualifies one from the battlefield.

It would be difficult to find a more devout individual than the Warsaw Ghetto Rebbe, yet he surely would not have claimed such an exemption. His altruistic "trembling" before God emerged out of a magnanimous fear that transcended his own person, provoking an overwhelming care for the spiritual and physical well-being of others. In their rejection of service, haredim are ironically oblivious to the full connotations of the Hebrew term they proudly adopt as their moniker. Isaiah 66:5 does indeed designate those who are consumed with obedience to "the word of the Lord" as haredim. However, 1 Samuel 13:7 adopts that very same term to depict the zeal of those who bravely followed King Saul into battle, in stark contrast to the fearful who remained behind and "cowered in caves and tunnels." ■

IDF paratrooper survives despite the odds

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For Israeli lieutenant Aharon Karov, life has always been unpredictable. In December 2008, Karov was celebrating with his wife, Tzvia, at their wedding. Twelve hours later, the member of Paratrooper Brigade 890 was on the ground in Gaza as Operation Cast Lead began.

In January 2009, Karov was walking through an old building in a besieged Gaza neighbourhood when an explosive detonated above his head. Members from his team thought he was dead. Aboard a helicopter on the way to an Israeli hospital, a medic slit Karov's throat to insert a breathing tube – a procedure that had never been attempted airborne before.

Israeli Lt. Aharon Karov speaks to Nahal soldiers at an army base in Israel about his story of adversity and staying connected to his faith.

Miraculously, despite a head and body pierced by more than 500 fragments of shrapnel, Karov survived. Twelve surgeries and operations later, the soldier is walking proof that one can overcome anything one sets his or her mind to.

"Today, I don't feel anything from the injury," Karov told The Canadian Jewish News, via a translator. "Baruch HaShem."

Karov, 28, will be arriving in Toronto a few days before Yom Ha'atzmaut to speak with high school students and at local synagogues about his story.

Joining Karov is his father, Rabbi Zev Karov, who recently published a book, Deep in the Heart, about his experiences during his son's recovery.

Lt. Aharon Karov speaks to visitors from the United States during Operation Pillar of Defense, the attack against terror groups in Gaza in November 2012.

Karov known as 'the groom who went to war'

Rabbi Karov began writing just two weeks after his son was wounded. "I was overwhelmed... from the compassion and the exhibition of Jewish unity in the media, newspapers," he said.

"People were calling me, sending letters. It was the birth of something very new and it inspired me to just start writing. I didn't think it was going to be a book."

The wounded soldier, also known as "the groom who went to war," lay in a coma for 10 days. When he woke up, Karov was unable to move his body. He could not recognize his wife and was unable to speak.

Karov had also lost about 25 per cent of his skull and his nose had been ripped away. Initially, doctors thought that he would never walk, speak or eat normally again.

"There was a difficult time about three months after the injury. I felt like it was not the same kid," Rabbi Karov said. "The main change was in his eyes. Something was not there, it was not the Aharon I knew."

However, the wounded soldier proved them wrong. Forty-five days after waking up, he was in a wheelchair and a nurse was helping him to stand up. Each day, he walked a few more steps, Karov himself told The CJN.

"When I arrived at rehab, [the doctors] did not have a goal that I was going to be normal again," he said. "For them, each goal was small... having me say one word, for instance. That was the goal set and that was what they focused on."

The soldier currently lives in Ariel, an Israeli settlement in the West Bank, with his wife and two children, four-year-old Hodaya and two-year-old Amitzur. He is a student at Ariel University and works for Panim el Panim, an Israeli organization that promotes Jewish unity and identity.

For Panim el Panim, Karov brings his message of Jewish identity and faith to soldiers in combat. He told The CJN he does not regret his decision to go into battle so soon after his wedding.

"When one is in the army... you are in a current mindset that when you are needed, it doesn't matter if you have anything else," he said "Anything else is prioritized to be second, even if it's your wedding."

Deep in the Heart, now printed in English, will be launched in Canada on May 5, at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) synagogue in Thornhill, Ont. Karov and his father will be present.

His speaking engagement in Toronto marks Karov's fourth tour outside of Israel– he has spoken in London, New York and Los Angeles.

In New York, the soldier did something that would have seemed impossible a few years earlier: he ran the New York Marathon. Karov ran it in four hours and 14 minutes. With the run, he raised more than $40,000 for OneFamily Fund, an Israeli organization that helps fund victims of terrorist attacks.

"Ever since the injury, I set myself goals. Even during the very beginning of rehab, everything was setting a goal of something I think I cannot do, and [I] achieve it," Karov said. "For me, [the New York Marathon] was another step of achieving something you may think you cannot do, but with the strength within you, you can achieve it." ■

ICRF honours four Women of Action

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Four outstanding women who excel in their professional fields, in addition to displaying a strong commitment to humanitarian causes, will be honoured next week at the Israel Cancer Research Fund's (ICRF) annual Women of Action luncheon.

"We are delighted to once again honour four women who have made significant contributions to our community, each in her own way. Funds raised at ICRF's annual Women of Action luncheon are used to help support top level cancer researchers working at institutions throughout Israel," said Bryna Goldberg, president of ICRF's Toronto chapter.

The May 6 event at the Fairmont Royal York in Toronto, now in its 12th year, has raised more than $3.4 million, which has been allocated to 49 Israeli scientists working on research in areas including pediatric bone cancer, colorectal cancer, and tumour-growth inhibition.

Judy Winberg, who will receive the Vicki Campbell "VAST" Community Award, said she feels overwhelmed and humbled by the honour.

"I never think that what I'm doing is for the recognition. I don't like the spotlight, but I've been led to believe that by accepting the honour I serve as a role model for others," she said.

Winberg, an educational consultant who founded Options in Education, an organization that offers education and relocation consultation, has served a number of organizations including Jewish Family and Child, Toronto Hadassah WIZO, Mount Sinai Hospital, Princess Margaret Hospital, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Joshua Institute for Jewish Leadership and Holy Blossom Temple.

"Judy is an outstanding member of our community. She is dedicated, very thoughtful, she's very serious in her approach to her community work and she is the kind of volunteer anyone would be happy to have working with them on an important cause," said event co-chair Debra Campbell, sister-in-law of Vicki Campbell, for whom the VAST award is named.

Winberg, who was introduced to ICRF when she served on the committee for the 2009 Women of Action event, when her friend Vicki Campbell was honoured, said she has great respect for the work ICRF does.

"I've been involved with a number of other cancer-related organizations. My own mother and her two siblings succumbed to cancer, and Vicki as well, so I have a very close relationship, I'm afraid, with cancer, and thank God, not from my own experience," she said, adding that her mother died in 2001 after battling cancer for several years.

Judy Winberg

> I never think that what I'm doing is for the recognition. I don't like the spotlight, but I've been led to believe that by accepting the honour I serve as a role model for others.

"I'm also a committed Zionist, and I have done many things to support Israel over the years... The idea of supporting scientists who are working there is also very important to me."

In addition to Winberg, Dr. Eva Grunfeld, the evening's scientific honoree, will also be recognized for her research, which focuses on the access to and quality of cancer care across the cancer continuum, from screening to end-of-life care. Grunfeld is a physician scientist with the Ontario Institute for Cancer Research's Health Services Research Program.

Lisa Ray, the evening's inspirational story honoree, is an internationally acclaimed film actress who starred in the Oscar-nominated film Water, as well as a TV host and model.

In 2009, Ray used the red carpet at the Toronto International Film Festival as a stage to speak out about being diagnosed with multiple myeloma, a rare blood cancer.

Her blog, called the Yellow Diaries, chronicled her experience and led Harper Collins to publish her autobiography, and she continues to raise funds and awareness for multiple myeloma research.

Receiving the Carole Tanenbaum WOA Business Award will be Jenny Witterick, president of Sky Investment Counsel, one of the largest managers of international equities in Canada, which she founded in 2004.

In 2013, her debut novel, My Mother's Secret became a bestseller in Canada and was selected as a finalist for the U.S. Jewish Book Awards in 2013. When Witterick received an advance on her novel, she donated the entire amount to various charities.

Debra Campbell, who is co-chairing the event for the second time, said she expects guests to feel inspired by the women being honoured, all of whom will address the gathering.

"It'll be very inspiring and it's usually quite emotional when we hear about the accomplishments of all the honorees and they'll learn about the important work being done by ICRF-funded scientists in Israel."■

Survivor talks of hope in Shoah's darkest hours

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Seventy years ago, during the darkest days of the Holocaust, those caught up in the war began moving from thoughts of permanent horror to potential hope that the war's end would be near.

For Hungarian Jew Leslie Meisels, 1944 was a year of both horror and hope. This year's Holocaust Remembrance Day marked the 70th anniversary of the announcement that Jews from his hometown of Nadudvar would be forced from their homes into a ghetto.

"What kept me going? That simple four-letter word: hope," Meisels told a crowd of more than 1,000 at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Community Campus on Sunday. "Every survivor is alive because some miracles happened to them when they should have perished."

Meisels, now 87, was one of several survivors who attended this year's Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah commemoration with their families in memory of the six million Jews, including 1.5 million children, who perished in the Holocaust.

Violinist Uri Mayer played a tribute to the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust.

The thought that future generations won't hear first-person accounts from witnesses of the Shoah, such as Meisels, wasn't lost on anyone at the ceremony.

"This is a time when the Holocaust is passing from living memory into history," said DJ Schneeweiss, consul general of Israel in Toronto. "By keeping history alive, we also keep ourselves alive in history."

Fortunately for Meisels, all five of his siblings survived the war. His family was part of a group of nearly 2,000 Jews in an exchange between Rudolf Kastner and Adolf Eichmann. Eichmann allowed nearly 2,000 Jews to live in exchange for gold, diamonds and money. But Meisels still ended up at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where his family was allowed to stay together and treated with more compassion than other prisoners. Yet their lives were still very fragile.

"I entered [Bergen-Belsen] at a robust 175 pounds," Meisels said. "After four months, I became a 75-pound, emaciated skeleton. To die there was easy. To stay alive was a hard fight."

He told a rapt crowd that before the Nazis occupied Hungary in March 1944, the country's government fed its citizens propaganda, making them believe the stories of cruelty from nearby countries were only rumours.

The somber ceremony also featured a stirring violin performance by Uri Mayer, who played over footage of images from Yad Vashem's Auschwitz Album projected on screens around the hall.

The album has photos that SS officers took when 430,000 Hungarian Jews arrived at Auschwitz in 1944, many of whom were murdered within two months. Some 570,000 Hungarian Jews perished in the Holocaust.

"Even today in this age of liberty and opportunity, many of us worry that the evil winds of that earlier time may be returning," Schneeweiss warned.

Meisels and his wife, Eva, a child survivor of the Budapest ghetto who was saved by Raoul Wallenberg, are involved with educating thousands of students every year. Meisels' story of survival is featured in Suddenly the Shadow Fell, part of the Azrieli Series of Holocaust Survivor Memoirs.

Meisels, who lives in Toronto, also documented his experiences as part of Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation.

"All future generations must remember these facts," Meisels said. "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it. We must and we will remember." ■

GUEST VOICE

Remember what, exactly?

MICHAEL FRAIMAN

Reg Hartt began screening Triumph of the Will, Leni Riefenstahl's distressingly seminal 1934 documentary of a rising Nazi Germany, around downtown Toronto in the 1970s. He is neither a Nazi nor a Jew, but has been mistaken for both.

After one packed screening in his living room at 463 Bathurst St., a man sitting near the front asked him: "Are you a Jew?" Hartt lied and said yes. "I knew it," the man sneered, and launched into a violently anti-Semitic rant that shocked and silenced the crowd.

Hartt smiled calmly in response and said nothing. He'd been watching the man's son, who'd been so embarrassed by his father's hatred that he'd awkwardly shifted away from him as much as possible.

"His son had never seen that ugliness for what it is until that moment," Hartt later recalled to me. "And the father was doing more to separate his son from that belief than anything I could do, or anything anyone else could do in a million years."

Every Tuesday in April, auspiciously coinciding with Yom Hashoah on the eve of April 27, Hartt has screened Triumph of the Will as part of his Power of Propaganda Film Festival at the Cineforum, the downtown townhouse-cum-indie-theatre he's been running for decades. It's meant to coincide with Hitler's birthday.

"It's important not to get emotional," Hartt said, remembering the anonymous death threats he's received for screening the acclaimed Nazi propaganda.

"It's like a surgeon going in to cut something in a patient's body that has to be removed – it may look flipping disgusting, but he cannot afford to get emotional when he sees that… This is one of the things that people forget when they get all caught up in, 'Oh, this is disgusting.' Well, yes it is, OK, fine. But we've got to deal with this."

Modern Jews are inching closer to the uncomfortable reality that, pretty soon, there will be no more Holocaust survivors. Once that happens, the link is severed – "Never again" will become completely abstracted. We'll understand the Holocaust exclusively through theories and history books. But what do middle class Jews know about concentration camps? What does a 10-year-old kid know about honouring the dead? How can we remember something we never saw?

Last November, I visited Berlin's famous Jewish Museum. It's gorgeous and fluidly designed, but nothing hits harder than the Holocaust Tower, a powerful art installation by architect David Libeskind. It's basically an enormous and empty stone triangle prison shooting up from an unheated basement, unlit but for a single sliver of daylight 20 metres overhead. It's truly terrifying. Once you're in it, you immediately feel hopeless and afraid. If you're in there alone, like I was, the isolation is palpable.

It's time to talk about kids' mental health

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We see it in our homes, in our families, in our classrooms, in our workplaces – everywhere! We know it. We often don't speak of it, but we do know it.

It is mental illness.

Benjamin Elliott Zeligson (Ben) suddenly and unexpectedly took his life on April 6. He was 15 years old.

Ben was overcome by mental illness.

The news of Ben's passing shocked everyone who knew him, and even those who didn't know him.

Ben's parents, Carolann Aitken and Larry Zeligson, found themselves surrounded by a community who gathered in disbelief to mourn the happiest person they knew.

"Ben touched so many people's lives with his smile, with his lovely sense of humour and his need to have everyone feel included," Aitken said. "Ben was blessed with the ability to spread love and laughter wherever he went."

He had many interests, she said.

"Ben was an academic who excelled in languages. Bilingual in French, he spent his weekends Skyping with a woman from China to learn Mandarin. For his most recent birthday, he bought himself Italian tapes to learn Italian, and I have no doubt he would have mastered that if he wanted to."

He was a regular fixture in the kindergarten and autism classrooms, volunteering during recess and lunch hours to support the students, his mother added.

Inspired by his maternal grandmother, a food lover, Ben loved to cook and to talk about cooking. He loved to read. He sang in the choir at Forest Hill Collegiate, where he was a student.

"Ben was surrounded by a family that loved him immensely and many, many caring friends," said Julian Jaffary, mother of Ben's longtime close friend Eric. "When he called his mom or dad from our house he ended each and every conversation with two simple words: 'Love you.' Ben enriched everyone around him."

Meagan's Walk raises funds for pediatric brain cancer

CARA EDELL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Just before her fifth birthday, Meagan Bebenek drew a special picture for Mother's Day. As she gave it to her mom Denise, she explained how the people in the picture were mommy and daddy and the object above their heads was Meagan, a little angel who would always be with them.

It had been five months since her diagnosis of brainstem glioma, a cancerous and inoperable brain tumour.

In the months that she had cancer, Meagan managed to live life to its fullest, as naturally as a child with her disease could. She went to preschool when she was well enough, played with friends when she was strong enough and cuddled every living creature she could find.

Meagan died in 2001 with her family by her side. She never complained about her treatments; rather, she focused on making and wrapping presents to give to her caregivers and loved ones.

When Denise left the Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids) for the last time without Meagan, she knew something had to be done to help others like her daughter. Her mission that would become Meagan's Walk began.

Meagan Bebenek

Denise's vision transitioned into a spirited community walk to create hope and awareness about the illness that is the leading cause of cancer-related death in young people aged 20 and under.

"In 2002, we started the walk with our friends and family and ended at the Hospital for Sick Children where we held hands in a human hug," Denise said. "We raised $80,000 that year. In the 12 years since, the momentum has continued."

To date, Meagan's Walk has raised more than $3.1 million. All of the funds raised go directly to the Arthur and Sonja Labatt Brain Tumour Research Centre at the Hospital for Sick Children.

On May 10, Mother's Day weekend, thousands of people will once again walk the five kilometres, from Fort York to SickKids. 2014 is the Year of the Hug, celebrating the wish of young Meagan to be able to hug the world and provide hope to those who are ill.

When the walk ends, participants will create a circle around the hospital, symbolizing Meagan's wish to hug not only the families with sick children, but the entire community.

"The hug has always been a very important part of Meagan's Walk. Those children who are inside look down at everyone and can see that we are sending love and hope to them. It is a very emotional moment. We may not be able to hug every person in every province and in every country, but in many ways we are embracing the world," Denise said. ■

Yom Hazikaron

Ceremony to honour fallen soldiers, victims of terror

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Jewish community in Canada has long taken pride in Israel's triumphs, so it only makes sense for it to share when it grieves.

On May 4 at 6:15 p.m., expat Israelis along with members of the local Jewish community will gather at the Beth Tzedec Congregation to mark Yom Hazikaron, the official memorial ceremony for Israel's fallen soldiers and victims of terror, sponsored by the Consulate General of Israel.

As many as 2,000 people are expected to attend the event, the Israeli equivalent of Remembrance Day.

Held according to the Hebrew calendar one day prior to Israel's Independence Day, Yom Hazikaron is a solemn commemoration that precedes the festive celebrations that mark Israel's rebirth.

The service blends elements of the religious and secular, with Kaddish being intoned and a candle lit in memory of those who have fallen. At the same time, the evening will include a program of Israeli songs.

The day provides an opportunity for people living in Toronto to express their solidarity with the Jewish state.

Nehama Isaak

"It's like standing with Israel," explained Nehama Isaak, the IDF and rehabilitation co-ordinator at the consulate.

The program focuses on the sacrifices made by those who serve in the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF), as well as those killed in terrorist attacks.

One of those who will be remembered is Tom Farkas, an IDF pilot with a connection to Toronto. Farkas, whose family hailed from Israel, was born in Toronto. When he was around eight years of age, the family moved back to Israel. About 10 years later, Farkas joined the air force. He was killed in a plane crash during the second Lebanon war in 2006.

"His grandmother and uncle will light a candle" at the service, Isaak said.

Also participating in the program will be Ofra Roberts, whose brother, Yoav Vaspi, was a decorated hero of the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Vaspi's son, Arnon, was also killed in action, during the 1982 Lebanon War. Roberts will place a wreath on behalf of bereaved families.

Zionist youth groups and organizations advocating on behalf of Israeli soldiers will lay other wreaths, while members of ShinShin, a Hebrew acronym for year of service – a reference to young Israeli emissaries known as shinshinim – will read soldiers' letters and perform a song written in memory of those killed in military service.

Harold Kimelman, whose daughter, Marnie, was killed in 1990 when a bomb went off on the beach in Tel Aviv, will say Kaddish, the prayer for the dead. And Lee Solomon, a Toronto native currently serving in the IDF, will read a message from Gen. Binyamin "Benny" Gantz, the IDF's chief of general staff.

Yom Hazikaron is especially significant to Israelis, Isaak explained. "Everybody here has a friend who died or was wounded," she said.

"For us, as Israelis, it's like a sacred day," Isaak said. All Israelis show their respect for the country's bereaved families and for the soldiers who ensure the country's security. "It shows the families we're sorry about their loss and that it is our loss."

Isaak, who is completing a three-year stint in Toronto and will soon be returning to Israel, said when she first arrived in Canada, she was impressed how local Jews came out in big numbers for Yom Hazikaron events.

They see the importance of a strong Israel, protected by the IDF, as a safe haven for Jews around the world.

"Yom Hazikaron is a good opportunity for the Jewish community to support Israel," she said. ■

Community lay leader assumes top job at Baycrest

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's not often in Jewish communal work that a long-time lay leader becomes a worker bee, but in Garry Foster's case, that scenario suits him just fine.

After joining the Baycrest Foundation last September on an interim basis, Foster was recently named its president and chief executive officer, meaning he reports to work at the world-famous facility for seniors every day.

As Foster puts it, "it wasn't as though I walked in and was never involved." Indeed, he comes to the job after serving as the lay vice-chair of the Baycrest Foundation and as a former chair of Baycrest's board of directors.

Along with those came a slew of other communal involvement: He chaired the board of governors at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies; served as president of Jewish Family & Child Service (now Jewish Family & Child), and was on the board at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

All of which, Foster said, stands him in good stead – both from the standpoint of understanding finances (he's an accountant to boot) and the community's workings and donor base.

While not much about his new job title has surprised him, Foster, who describes himself as "a young 66," still seems a bit off guard as he sits in his second floor office at Baycrest's executive suites.

"If you asked me a year ago, [among] a thousand things I could be doing today, this probably wouldn't have been on the list," he told The CJN with a chuckle.

> If you asked me a year ago, [among] a thousand things I could be doing today, this probably wouldn't have been on the list.

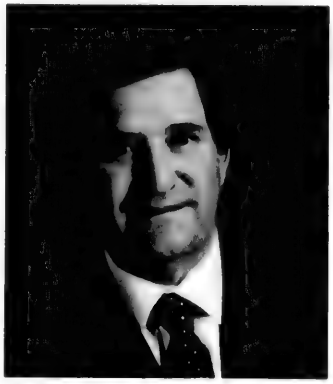
Foster heads the fundraising arm of Baycrest Health Sciences, helping secure money for the institution's main strengths: research into cognition, Alzheimer's disease, dementia, stroke, and "aging brain health"; medical programs and services for seniors living in the community; and a public education component to support what Baycrest terms "healthy aging and health-care solutions" for a growing senior population.

He breaks his job down into three bite-sized areas: Finding philanthropic money for onsite care, education and research.

Baycrest's overall annual budget is about $160 million, with the provincial government funding two-thirds of that. The world-renowned institution's "value added" component, Foster noted, comes from charitable giving. That includes the facility's many day and respite care programs, cultural and recreational activities, and provision of kosher food.

In 2013, the foundation raised $22 million in charitable donations, and the same is expected for 2014 (factoring in investment income, revenue will be roughly $30 million this year). Of that, about $17 million will be allotted to care, education and research. The difference goes to salaries and administration.



Garry Foster

At the Apotex Centre, Baycrest's long-term care facility, costs exceed the rate the government sets by $40 per resident per day, Foster pointed out.

"Here's the challenge we face," he explained. "As a community, we have an Apotex Centre that is full, with a long waiting list. We know the future is going to more [about] taking care of people in their homes. So while we have 472 beds in the nursing home, it's not going to be expanded to a thousand people. We have to have better day care and better programs to take care of people in their homes. And all that has to be funded in many respects through philanthropy." Foster turns aside a suggestion that with that much fundraising, Baycrest is in tension with UJA.

"Tension is probably the wrong word," he said. "Maybe 'competition.' Nothing would make me happier than finding a good project with UJA to help fund a piece of Baycrest."

Fundraisers everywhere get used to hearing two things: Government cutbacks and donor fatigue. Foster said he hasn't noticed too much of the latter. "The one thing that has amazed me is how deep the roots are of the donors at Baycrest."

Governments, on the other hand, "are strange things. If the government was just a payer, that's one thing. But they're both payer and provider. They tell you how to provide services, even though it may not be in some cases the efficient way, so sometimes you have to negotiate the money with the provision of the services."

But like all planners in his field, he's aware of what looms on the horizon: Baby boomers forming a huge cohort that will challenge everything from elderly care to pensions and public health funding.

How is Baycrest preparing? Mostly with a view toward more home care.

"That's huge," Foster said. "To some extent, we probably have to develop a big part of [Baycrest's 22-acre] campus to accommodate more people" – not necessarily in residential care but in more day programs.

"Day to day, Baycrest is in good shape, but when you take a look at what's coming, we know we have to increase the funding base."

But, there was another side of Ben. A side that he did not show to others.

"Ben had two separate personality platforms. He had one for the public and another for private," his father said.

As Ben's uncle, David Bernstein, put it: "There was a darkness that Ben was fighting, a terrible darkness. The darkness of the illness was so great that it prevented him from accepting the treatment that perhaps could have done something.

"Ben put his best face out there and it was that of a beautiful, smart, fun-loving boy who was interesting, curious and caring," said Rabbi Erin Polansky of Neshamah Congregation of York Region. "But, at the same time, he was in so much pain inside. He was so angry all the time but didn't know why, and the doctors couldn't help him find out why. His parents tried: they did everything, but no one knew why he couldn't get a handle on the frustrations of everyday life.

"He held it in when he was out there in public. He held it in and was like a bottle that was going to explode. When he was in a safe place, with his parents, he allowed it to explode – and when it exploded, it was huge. It was an eruption and he couldn't control it in the moment. He didn't mean to hurt the people he loved and he didn't mean to hurt himself. He just couldn't make it stop."

"We must talk about mental illness, give a voice to this terrible disease that affects so many of us," Rabbi Polansky added. "Ben touched so many people. We can pay that forward and touch so many more."

Children's Mental Health Week is May 4 to 10. Its goals are to increase awareness of the signs of child and youth mental health problems, decrease the stigma surrounding the illness and help people understand that help is available and treatment works.

In Ontario, one in five children and youth has a mental health problem, 500,000 kids, according to Children's Mental Health Ontario. Disorders range from anxiety, depression and conduct disorder to eating disorders, psychoses and bipolar disorder.

In Canada, suicide is the second-highest cause of death for youth aged 10 to 24.

The Canadian Mental Health Association says suicidal youngsters are in pain. They don't necessarily want to die – they want their pain to end. If their ability to cope is stretched to the limit, or if the problems occur together with a mental illness, it can seem that death is the only way to make the pain stop.

> There was a darkness that Ben was fighting, a terrible darkness

"Ben didn't want to end his life. He wanted to end his pain," his father said. "We have to learn to talk about mental illness without a stigma and be able to say, 'I have a mental illness,' in the same way as we would say, 'I have a physical illness.'" ■

Proud of work at Rotman Institute

Foster is especially proud of the work at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, which attempts to ease the impact of age-related illness and impairment. One project, the Virtual Brain, is the stuff of science fiction.

Working with colleagues on three continents, scientists at Baycrest are attempting to create a computer model of a fully functioning human brain that simulates how it functions under normal conditions, changes with aging and responds to damage from trauma or disease.

In the future, scientists will be able to study therapies on the computer model before testing them on humans.

Foster said current research on Alzheimer's disease is promising.

"It's clear that if you can delay Alzheimer's by five years, you basically cut the incidence of the disease in half. If you delay it by 10 years, you almost eradicate it." ■

Inside the outrageous world of mommy blogging

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

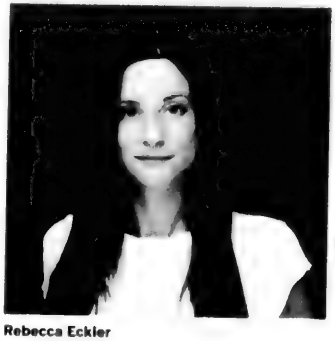
There's no denying the power of mommy bloggers. They're socially conscious and influential, and ferocious in their beliefs that they – and only they – know the right way to parent.

When did mommies become unkind and ruthless? And why? These are two questions author Rebecca Eckler asks herself daily.

Eckler, known for her frank and funny books about modern parenting, dedicated her ninth book – launched April 21 and titled The Mommy Mob: Inside the Outrageous World of Mommy Blogging – to the subject.

Aimed at mothers, The Mommy Mob takes readers on a journey into the world of mommy bloggers – more than four million of whom live in North America – whose passion is to blog, often anonymously, about motherhood and their kids. It's a laugh-out-loud look at self-styled enforcers of parental propriety in the wild arena of online motherly advice.

Eckler explores mommy blogging's innocent origins and its subsequent descent into darkness – how something that started as a way to connect mothers with other mothers and build a community of support, friendship and advice has turned into a snake pit of righteousness, vitriol and self-consciousness.



Rebecca Eckler

Equipped with more than a decade's experience, Eckler writes inspiring personal stories of her own journey as a parent and partner.

"I was on the cusp when everyone started to blog 10 years ago, and it was a really nice world back then. I found all those parents agreeable – 'I am with you on that – my son does this – maybe you should look into this.' They were actually very well meaning and interested in helping," Eckler said.

Her book is about what happened next.

Any time Eckler reveals a truth too raw for her readers to stomach, something she does often, the mommy mob bursts out of the nursery and chaos reigns.

With a following of more than 10,000, Eckler has been blogging for a site called Mommyish.com twice a week for the last three years. As a mother to a toddler and a 10-year-old, as well as stepmother to a tweenie and a teenager, Eckler shares her funniest, most controversial insights.

"It's my 700 words of a thought that day. For me, it's a moment in time. People don't always look at it that way," she said.

"I am writing something down that you are thinking, or at least one of your friends is thinking, or everyone is thinking – it's just that no one is writing it down."

In one post for Mommyish.com, Eckler talks about the name of her son, Holt, and how some people have made cracks about the store Holt Renfrew and how she must love shopping.

"When my grandfather came over to Canada from Poland, he couldn't get a job, because his last name was Burnholtz, which at that time was too Jewish-sounding. I wanted to bring back the name Holt, a part of Burnholtz, in memory of my grandfather, Sam, and my grandmother, Helen.

"Frankly, I'm not sure why people make jokes like this, considering some of the names they give their kids. In the real world, unlike the blogosphere, people who don't like the name you choose for your child, or any other aspect of parenting, may engage in some harsh behind-the-back talk to which you won't be privy, whereas posters in the blogosphere want you to read their harsh opinions," Eckler said.

"The point of blogging, I think, is for readers to read and relate. The mother is stuck at home with the baby, so when the baby naps, you can get a conversation started. Every site needs a blog. It needs a voice. It needs a personal touch. It is an easy way to get your thoughts out there, but Mama Bear will come out sometimes, in response to those nasty online comments."

Yet the mommy blogosphere isn't entirely nasty, she said.

"Not all mommy blog readers are judgmental. Sometimes, they band together and support one another… and even me!" ■

MP leaves legacy of wit, integrity

DAVID LAZARUS
dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Canada's first-ever Jewish federal cabinet minister, Herb Gray, was remembered with affection for his martini-dry wit, deft deflection skills during Question Period, powerful oratory and even for his affinity for rock music following his April 21 death at age 82 in Ottawa.

Friends and admirers, however, said Gray's greatest legacy would be his sheer longevity, integrity, devotion to social justice and respect for the rules and customs of the House of Commons, where bitter partisanship now prevails.

His serious, stolid appearance belied his reputation for wit, self-deprecation, and a total lack of cynicism.

Herb Gray

Colleagues once teasingly voted Gray as the "second sexiest man in Canada," and on hearing the news, he demanded a recount.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, a close friend of Gray's for many years, described him to The CJN as an "ultimate mensch," who excelled in every capacity he undertook.

"He was the dean of Parliament in terms of length and quality of service," Cotler said.

Two incidents stood out in his mind: in the 1970s, Gray, then a cabinet minister, agreed to be active in a Commission of Inquiry on Economic Coercion and discrimination related to the Arab boycott of Israel, a position that could have led him to be "at variance" with government policy.

Second, Gray made his good offices available to Cotler when he began to take up the case of Soviet prisoner of conscience Natan Sharansky.

"It was Herb who made the pivotal call to me to take up [Sharansky's] cause," Cotler recalled.

His moniker was the "Gray Fog," so named for his legendary Question Period obfuscation. Cotler laughed when recalling how the speaker of the House was left completely perplexed when Gray employed the Yiddish term narishkleiten (foolishness) when describing a comment coming from the other side of the House.

Gray praised by politicians, Jewish community

Gray served as a Liberal member of Parliament for just short of 40 years – including as deputy prime minister under Jean Chretien – between 1962 and 2002 in the riding of Essex West (which later became Windsor), the third-longest tenure in Canadian history behind former prime minister Wilfrid Laurier and John Haggart, both of whom died before 1920.

Gray served the longest continuous tenure as an MP in Canadian history.

"Beloved by all, Herb devoted a lifetime to his party and his country, in both good times and bad," Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau said in a statement. "He left behind an immense legacy unmatched by most in Canadian history."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper reacted on Twitter: "He was an honourable parliamentarian who served his country well."

In an April 23 statement, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs described Gray as an "icon in Canadian politics, a pioneer in Jewish civic engagement, and a distinguished Parliamentarian who made many contributions to advancing democracy in Canada."

B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant called him "an outstanding individual who represented his country and community with distinction. He will always be remembered as an honourable member of Parliament who served his constituency well and was always ready to speak out on human rights issues – particularly when they impacted the Canadian Jewish community."

The Windsor-born Gray was elected 13 consecutive times in his riding, the first in Opposition during the Tory government of John Diefenbaker and the last during Chrétien's Liberal government.

Gray's first appointment to cabinet was at age 38, without portfolio in 1969 in the government of Pierre Trudeau, and he would go on to be named to cabinet 11 times over 22 years under three prime ministers: Trudeau, John Turner, and Chrétien.

During Chrétien's term, Gray even served as his point man in Parliament during the so-called Shawinigate affair.

Gray's portfolios over the years included National Revenue; Industry, Trade, and Commerce; and Treasury Board president. Gray also served as government house leader (1993-1997); solicitor general (1993-1997); and as deputy prime minister (1997-2002). In 1990, he served as interim Opposition leader for 10 months following Turner's departure.

Gray's parents were Harry and Fanny, immigrants from Belarus who ran a yards-goods store in Windsor. He met his wife, Sharon Sholzberg-Gray, while she was a university student working on the Montreal election campaign of future prime minister John Turner.

According to the Globe and Mail, it was Turner who first suggested to Sholzberg that she and Gray meet. They married in 1967 and had two children, Jonathan and Elizabeth.

Gray received many honours and awards during his lifetime. He was among the few Canadian parliamentarians ever to be named "the Right Honourable," was a Companion of the Order of Canada, and received numerous honorary degrees and Jubilee medals.

In 2010, he even had a parkway in Windsor renamed after him.

Following his retirement in January 2002, Gray was named Canadian chair of the International Joint Commission, which deals with Canadian-American air and water issues and was appointed chancellor of Carleton University in November 2008.

Sholzberg-Gray told the Globe and Mail that her husband would be remembered for his "brilliance, wit, and charisma."

"He was always underestimated," she said. "He was a brilliant orator. He gave a political speech just as good as the best of them." ■

A special message for the Baycrest community

CommunityMatters

Baycrest celebrates Jewish Heritage Month

By Dr. William Reichman, Baycrest President and CEO & Garry Foster, Baycrest Foundation President and CEO

As an organization that was founded by the Jewish community nearly a century ago, Baycrest Health Sciences' strong commitment to Judaic culture and values has been ingrained into our very DNA. Visual reminders exist everywhere you look on our campus, from the artwork on the walls to the mementos and artifacts curated in our Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum. Weekly concerts bring traditional music to our residents and their families at The Terraces of Baycrest Retirement Residence and the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for Aged. And a full slate of cultural and spiritual programming helps enrich the quality of life of our residents, guided always by the principles of Judaism.

Our connection to our Jewish heritage is an intrinsic part of the way we provide care for seniors, here at Baycrest and in our community. Baycrest remains "a gift to the world" from our Jewish community, and continues to embrace the moral mandate of Tikkun Olam, or "repairing a broken world."

So it is our great honour to once again host a series of programs and exhibits to celebrate Jewish Heritage Month here on our Bathurst Street campus. We invite you to visit Baycrest throughout the month of May to experience the wide range of Jewish arts and cultural events that are planned.

Some of the notable events include:

- The dedication of a heritage plaque by Heritage Toronto to commemorate the history of Baycrest and the Toronto Jewish Old Folks' Home. The event takes place at the south entrance of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged on May 28 at 11 a.m.
- A month-long exhibition of archival photographs, performance posters, and a recreated shtetl scene, celebrating the Golden Age of Yiddish theatre in Toronto.
- An exploration of the unique Jewish relationship to the written word through textile based artwork created by members of The Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles.
- Judaic artwork made by members of the Donald and Elaine Rafelman Creative Arts Studio.

The following special exhibitions on display at Baycrest have been extended for Jewish Heritage Month:

Origins of Judaic Symbols
Origins of Judaic Symbols explores recurring symbols of divinity, identity and culture found on the art and artifacts in the collection of The Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum.

Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life
In Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life, photographer Elliot Sylman tells the story of the endurance and resiliency of Holocaust survivors through images of 180 people, all of whom are Baycrest residents and/or program participants. You can view the portraits on the first floor, near our Bathurst entrance, or see the collection online at www.baycrest.org/preciouslegacy.

Help us grow our Tree of Life campaign

Baycrest is fortunate to have the strong support of our community in ensuring we can continue to offer such rich cultural and spiritual programming to seniors. Government funding does not cover all of our costs for these innovative programs. We need your support to continue programs that have made Baycrest a focal point for the care needs of generations of Toronto families.

Please visit our website and make a sustainable four-year commitment to Baycrest and our Tree of Life campaign—funding we can count on year-over-year for programs that go above and beyond the norm. Find out more about the Tree of Life campaign at:

We don't get that in school. We can watch Spielberg documentaries and listen to survivor interviews all we like, but if we want to really grapple with the horrors of the Holocaust, we need something closer to experiential learning. We need to be engrossed by the essence of evil. We need to stare into the eyes of Hitler and see Hitler staring back.

This is a growing trend across the world. Consider the bold and unsettling wave of Israeli teenagers tattooing their grandparents' concentration camp numbers on the inside of their forearms.

"All my generation knows nothing about the Holocaust," 21-year-old Eli Sagir explained to the New York Times in 2012. "You talk with people and they think it's like the Exodus from Egypt – ancient history. I decided to do it to remind my generation: I want to tell them my grandfather's story and the Holocaust story."

It's an unbelievable gesture, to say nothing of the fact that Israeli high school students already make pilgrimages to Polish and German concentration camps, an experience I'm sure is far more unsettling than my own moment in an art installation.

But we're limited as Canadians, emotionally and physically, and that makes it easier to fall into complacency.

We have to rattle ourselves out of that. If we can't fly to Germany, let's bring Germany to us: facing Nazi propaganda at its purest offers an unfiltered look at actually understanding the whole mess of 70 years ago, like why beleaguered postwar Germans would believe in hailing their messianic leader.

It paints his portrait beautifully and proudly, and only by confronting that directly can we understand what we mean when we say, "Never again." ■

Fichman makes tennis history in Quebec City

Canadian Fed Cup tennis player Sharon Fichman of Toronto and her teammates were already celebrating winning their April 20 Fed Cup tie against Slovakia in Quebec City prior to Fichman taking to the court for her doubles match with teammate Gabriela Dabrowski. With last week's Fed Cup 3-1 win in the best-of-five match Fed Cup World Group playoff over the Slovaks, Canada made tennis history with its victory by advancing to the world group of eight nations that will compete in 2015 for the Fed Cup championship. NCSY celebrates 60 years

CARA EDELL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Over the past six decades, the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) has provided more than 250,000 Jewish teens with opportunities to explore their heritage and connect with Jewish life in a warm and welcoming environment.

Through Shabbatons, regional conventions, Jewish student union clubs and a host of summer programs, the youth movement of the Orthodox Union has inspired many of our current community leaders.

Educators, philanthropists, medical professionals, lawyers and entrepreneurs credit NCSY for their Jewish observance, leadership abilities and public speaking skills. Their identities have been shaped, in many ways, thanks to their involvement with the organization.

This year marks a special milestone, as NCSY celebrates its 60th anniversary.

Rabbi Glenn Black, CEO of NCSY Canada, spoke to The CJN about the movement's history, evolution and successes.

"We are marking [the anniversary] in so many ways. We recently hosted a weekend of inspiration at nine synagogues in our community. As part of our focus on alumni that we have reinvigorated in 2014, we held an event open for the entire community, with several of our speakers addressing the challenges facing our next generation and held an NCSY-style kumzitz featuring internationally renowned Jewish singers Abie Rotenberg and Shlomo Simcha," he said.

"We are continuing to reach out to our alumni with a robust social media presence. The feedback has been great, and many of our alumni are asking us how they can become involved in our work and give back. We are also working closely with the national office and taking part in their initiatives such as the recent special edition of Ignite, NCSY's popular magazine, telling the tale of how we made it from 1954 until now."

When NCSY was founded in 1954, American Judaism was struggling with continued observance, as people were becoming more absorbed into mainstream American culture, Rabbi Black said.

"NCSY was founded to keep Jewish teens connected and engaged with their heritage. The movement sought to create and connect various youth programs across the country, creating a movement to give teens strength and support to enable them to live fulfilling Jewish lives. That goal remains the same today."

NCSY girls at the Kotel.

Rabbi Black said the same passion for Judaism and outreach to Jewish youth has carried into the present.

"Practically, the programming is no longer based out of shuls, because it is seeking a wider reach. In Canada, our primary focus has been on reaching out to unaffiliated and unconnected Jewish teens, primarily in public high schools and non-parochial private schools. These teens are at the greatest risk of disappearing from the Jewish scene, as the recent Pew study [of U.S. Jewry] demonstrated. Expanding our reach, and constantly seeking innovative ways to involve Jewish youth, pushes us to move forward every day."

NCSY has seen a lot of gradual change over the past 60 years, even though the heart of the organization remains the same, he said.

"One of the major leaps was going from being a synagogue-based movement to bringing our programming to the unaffiliated."

Among its many innovative opportunities for youth, NCSY has created Jewish culture clubs in schools and a Torah High program that offers Jewish studies courses for credit to hundreds of students across the country.

"Implementing programming in Israel was also a big step. This summer, NCSY Canada will be sending close to 200 teens on summer programs. We will continue to grow these numbers."

Rabbi Black said NCSY has always made it a priority to engage youths on their terms, in their language. "That began with bringing on student advisers rather than just rabbis to be leaders of the movement. Going digital was also a major decision made to keep NCSY relevant and has been highly successful."

While NCSY runs many programs, Rabbi Black said one of the most popular is Live-2Give, combining tzedakah, social action and Jewish learning for young women.

"Another is our Jewish Professional Association for high school, giving aspiring business and professional faculty students the opportunity to be mentored by successful entrepreneurs who have taken leadership roles in the community."

In terms of future aspirations, Rabbi Black said NCSY has several areas of focus, including "leveraging cutting-edge technology to enable us to reach a far broader audience of Jewish teens... [and] investing more resources in professional development in order to increase the depth and breadth of our team of more than 350 staff and advisers."

Ultimately, he said, NCSY is on a "mission to inspire the Jewish future." ■

Students get a taste of business world

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Entrepreneur and Startup TanenbaumCHAT founder Daniel Warner said he hopes the inaugural conference will expose Jewish students to the endless possibilities in the business world.

Warner, an Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto alum, said he was inspired to organize the event after noticing that in his four years of speaking at the TanenbaumCHAT career day, he was always the only entrepreneur on the panel.

"I wanted to educate them and empower them to know that they too can create a business and follow their passion and essentially build their future as opposed to someone else's. If they want to work for a big corporation, that's totally fine. We just want them to know that they can go out and create their own business and be their own boss," said Warner, an MBA graduate from the Schulich School of Business, and the VP strategy and brand partnerships for SnapSaves, a digital grocery coupon app.

He said he approached TanenbaumCHAT's advancement department with the idea for a day-long entrepreneurship-themed conference.

"I suggested that I bring in my colleagues from the startup space, whether they are investors, advisers, lawyers, experts, incubators, social entrepreneurs, entrepreneurs who work in Israel – literally, the entire spectrum," he said.

When Warner, 31, was a student at TanenbaumCHAT, he was working towards becoming a pediatrician, taking courses in biology, chemistry and physics. It wasn't until he enrolled at Westmount Collegiate Institute for an extra year of high school that he took a course in business administration.

"That ultimately led me to study business in my undergrad, getting my MBA, starting six different startups in marketing and media and technology and social media and I was inspired, especially while I was in university, to bring these opportunities to kids really early on."

The event offered eight panels that focused on topics including women entrepreneurs, business incubators in Toronto, Israel's startup nation, and venture capitalism.

In addition to the 30 plus business leaders who participated in the panels were two keynote speakers – fashion designer and entrepreneur Erin Kleinberg, and Ryerson University business professor and co-founder of Canada's Ernst & Young's Venture Capital Advisory Group, Sean Wise.

The event also featured a networking dinner that allowed the 125 students who registered for the event to converse with the participants, and a competition modelled after the popular television show called Dragon's Den.

"A really great part was our Dragon's Den competition, which we called Beit Dragon. We had a panel of dragons and... the winning team got a maximum of $2,000 per team, so $500 per person, and it was awesome. There were 12 entries into the competition."

He said the winning concept was a food delivery service for university and college students.

"If someone is looking for a home-cooked meal or several, it is essentially a courier service where parents would be able to ship out home-cooked food to their kids."

Warner, who plans to make this an annual event, wants the students at his alma mater to understand that even those who don't have ambitions to run a business can benefit from entrepreneurial knowledge.

"For those people who are keen on being professionals – doctors, lawyers, accountants, what have you – they still need some business acumen to build their practice or firm. We also wanted to educate those kids... For them to be truly successful, they have to treat it like it's their own business," he said. ■

Two popes who changed Jewish-Catholic relations

RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

Popes John XXIII and John Paul II were declared saints of the Roman Catholic Church on April 27, the day that was also the eve of Yom Hashoah.

It's a coincidence but a notable one.

These two post-Holocaust pontiffs revolutionized relations between Catholics and Jews, fostering interfaith dialogue and embedding respect for Jews and Judaism in official Catholic dogma.

"These two popes transformed not just the church, but made a bigger impact on the outside world – and on us," said Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, a vice-president of the World Union of Progressive Judaism and longtime participant in Jewish-Catholic dialogue. "As a Jew, my life, and the safety and security of Jews, have been improved by the actions of these two individuals."

Pope Francis, who took office little more than a year ago, presided over the solemn ceremony at the Vatican, that took place on the day Catholics celebrate as the Second Sunday of Easter. It was Pope Francis who decided to canonize the two former popes in an unprecedented joint ceremony.

Millions of the faithful converged on the Eternal City for the event, which was also attended by representatives of the Jewish community including Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni; the American Jewish Committee's international director of interreligious affairs, Rabbi David Rosen; and Pope Francis' personal friend, Rabbi Abraham Skorka of Argentina.

Pope John XXIII, who reigned from 1958 until his death in 1963, initiated policies that changed nearly 2,000 years of church teaching.

First, he cancelled the words "perfidious Jews" from Good Friday prayers. Then, to reform and update the church, he convened the Second Vatican Council in 1962. This council in 1965 issued the Nostra Aetate declaration, a landmark document of less than 1,600 words that called for Jewish-Catholic dialogue and rejected the ancient Christian stigma against Jews as killers of Jesus.

More than two decades earlier during World War II, as Cardinal Angelo Roncalli, the future pope had worked actively to save Jews, using his position as papal nuncio in Turkey to draw up false papers for Jewish refugees. Pope Francis highlighted these actions while speaking with reporters last year about the canonizations.

"How many testimonies of false baptism he did in Turkey in favour of the Jews," Pope Francis said. "He was a courageous man, a good country priest, with such a great sense of humor – so great, and great holiness."

Pope John Paul II, who reigned from 1978 to 2005, made Catholic-Jewish reconciliation a cornerstone of his papacy. Born Karol Wojtyla in Wadowice, Poland in 1920, he grew up with Jewish friends and was an eyewitness to both the Holocaust and totalitarian communism.

In 1979, on his first trip back to Poland, he prayed at Auschwitz, and throughout his reign he repeatedly condemned anti-Semitism, commemorated the Holocaust, and met with Jewish leaders and laymen.

In 1986, he made history by crossing the Tiber River to Rome's Great Temple to become the first pope to visit a synagogue. There he embraced Rome's then Chief Rabbi Elio Toaff, and honoured Jews as Christianity's "elder brothers in faith."

Moreover, Pope John Paul oversaw the establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel and prayed for forgiveness for Catholic persecutions of Jews in the past.

His emotional pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 2000 left "the indelible picture of his sticking this prayer into a crack in the Western Wall," Lisa Palmieri-Billig, the AJC's representative in Rome and liaison to the Holy See recounted.

The popes who followed popes John XXIII and John Paul have built on their legacy. Pope Francis, who had a close relationship with the Jewish community when archbishop of Buenos Aires, has demonstrated attention to Jewish issues since his election in February 2013 and will visit Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories this month.

On the whole, said Rabbi Bretton-Granatoor, "things today are pretty good between Catholics and Jews."

But some sticking points do linger. These include the issue of opening the Vatican's World War II archives to clarify the wartime role of Pope Pius XII, whom critics accuse of failing to act to save Jews during the Holocaust. ■

Tfillin as a catalyst for Jewish change

Josh Gottesman

It's a common belief that Rashi's daughters wore tfillin while they prayed. Whether historical fact or mere lore, this belief speaks to a longstanding tradition of questioning the boundaries of this ostensibly gendered role. While practitioners of liberal streams of Judaism have long permitted women to lay tfillin, in recent months, the issue has emerged amongst the more Orthodox factions as well. Though the changes are brewing at the grassroots level, led by young women who want to engage in a practice that brings spiritual meaning to their lives, the probability for expanded impact is great, both among young women and their elders who may well follow suit.

Such change is not new in Judaism. Indeed, as Judaism and Jews have constantly been faced by an ever-changing reality, so, too, have they undergone a fairly constant process of change. In his recently published book Flexigidity: The Secret of Jewish Adaptability, the Reut Institute's president and founder, Gidi Grinstein, aptly described the process by which even the most conservative forces in Judaism likewise adapt: "Their evolution is slow, often invisible to the impatient eye. But a broader view exposes the radical transformations that even the most conservative groups in Judaism undergo, rendering the view that they are stagnant and immobile unfounded."

Innovations such as cellphones and Shabbat elevators have made a remarkable and undeniable impact on the halachically observant world. The use of electric candles instead of actual fire in hospital rooms, lights on timers during Shabbat and the numerous innovations developed by the Zomet Institute in Israel – "dedicated to seamlessly merging halachic Judaism with modern life" – have all centred on how to keep our ancient laws relevant in the modern world.

Concurrently, we're witnessing the hard-earned fruits of the struggle of Women of the Wall. After years of persistent prayer in the face of hostile and even violent opposition, the State of Israel has finally recognized the right of these women to worship in the sacred spot that is the inheritance of all the People of Israel.

This move is in contrast to, and a reaction against, a process of extreme centralization of religious authority that began with the birth of modern Israel. As described in Flexigidity: "Upon the establishment of the State of Israel, its government took the power to legislate and regulate on matters of Jewish life, which had hitherto been resolved by the workings of Judaism's 'invisible hand.' The Knesset, the government and the courts began to shape the Jewishness of society in a top-down manner… In such an environment, Orthodox factions came to dominate and domineer Israeli society in most matters relating to Israel's Jewishness and religious assets."

That the current state of religious affairs in Israel is unsustainable is obvious to any acute observer. The inconsistent and discriminatory decisions of the rabbinate are being brought into greater light, along with its ambiguous and unclear relationship with the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America (RCA). The aspersions cast upon the conversions of Rabbi Avi Weiss ultimately have done more to undermine the credibility of the RCA and the rabbinate than the credibility of Rabbi Weiss, one of modern Orthodoxy's strongest proponents.

The line between custom and law is often a blurry one. The path that Jews walk, our Halachah, by necessity must be adjusted to the context in which we find ourselves. Abandoning stringencies and restrictions that may have served a purpose at one time but are not inherent to the Halachah is an inevitable process.

There's no explicit Jewish law that prohibits women from laying tfillin, and the inertia that has thus far kept women from engaging in the practice seems to be losing its grip.

Balancing the flexibility necessary to deal with such circumstances with the rigidity necessary to maintain loyalty and adherence to our roots is the challenge and the call of Flexigidity. ■

No talks with Hamas, Netanyahu says

RAPHAEL AHREN
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday Israel will be looking for alternative paths to peace with the Palestinians and insisted that he won't negotiate with any government that's backed by Hamas.

If a negotiated peace proves impossible because of the makeup of the Palestinian government, "we will seek other ways," Netanyahu told CNN. "I am not going to accept a stalemate. I won't accept another Palestinian state that is an Iranian offshoot of Iran, firing missiles in our cities… But I do seek a two-states-for-two-peoples solution. If I can't have it right away with this Palestinian government, then we will seek other ways."

Netanyahu said he told his cabinet Sunday that Israel would "take time out now for reassessment" and try to figure out "alternative paths to peace." The simplest way, however, was for Abbas to renounce the deal with Hamas, he said.

He also left the door open for Hamas to moderate its views and recognize Israel, accept past agreements and renounce terror, though he said that was unlikely.

On April 24, Israel suspended peace talks in the wake of a unity deal the previous day between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction and Hamas.

Though Abbas has insisted the Palestinian leadership will continue to recognize Israel and renounce violence, Hamas said Sunday it would never acknowledge Israel's existence, rebuffing reports it was considering the shift.

Speaking to CNN, Netanyahu reiterated that he won't negotiate with any government backed by Hamas, even though the Palestinian unity government would be headed by Abbas and adhere to previous agreements with Israel. He rejected the argument the new government would be technocratic and not contain members of either Hamas or Fatah, likening it to a mafia organization that places "more respectable people" in the front office, while thugs sit in the back. "We're not going to buy this trick."

"I call on President Abbas: tear up your pact with Hamas. Recognize the Jewish state. Come back to a real peace process," Netanyahu said.

He also repeated his dismissal of a statement from Abbas recognizing the Holocaust as the "most heinous crime," saying the Palestinian leader was doing "damage control."

Netanyahu said he tried to "reconcile" Abbas' statement with the fact that just a few days earlier his Fatah group signed the pact with Hamas, which "denies the Holocaust and openly calls for a new extermination of the six million Jews of Israel."

He said Abbas "can't have it both ways. He can't say the Holocaust was terrible but at the same time embrace those who deny the Holocaust and seek to perpetrate another destruction of the Jewish People. I think what he's probably trying to do is damage control."

He wants to "placate western opinion, which understands that he delivered a terrible blow to the peace process" by embracing Hamas and "he's trying to wiggle his way out of it," Netanyahu said.

The Hamas-Fatah deal "was quite a disappointment… but we decided to wait and see what happens on the Palestinian side when a new government is created," she said, noting the government suspended rather than called off talks. ■

Family photo inspires artist

RITA POLIAKOV
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Adad Hannah didn't have a traditional upbringing. As a child, the artist spent his time touring Europe with his family while performing experimental theatre.

"We would busk. I learned math counting money in a hat," he said.

It's this photo that sparked Hannah's latest exhibition, currently featured at the Koffler Gallery. Three Generations is a video-recorded tableau vivant – a medium that Hannah specializes in.

Literally, a "living picture," a tableau vivant is a way of recreating a photo using live actors. Hannah, a Vancouver-based artist, spent months remaking every detail of the newspaper photo, from the dress his mother wore to the brush his grandmother used. In some ways, the very nature of tableau vivant poses a challenge.

"It's a complicated process to restage something. It's a lot of work for a simple outcome," Hannah said. "When the initial photo was taken, it was one photographer. But I really explode it and make it into a bigger production. I have someone make a dress that matches the dress my mother was wearing. I have to do casting for the models. I'm taking this instantaneous moment of a snap shot and expanding it into a video."

The exhibit also features an interview with his grandmother and collages of family photos made by his mother, Barbara Txi, both elements Hannah is proud of.

"(This is) also about my grandmother becoming an artist," he said. "I could see how happy she was to be part of this."

While Hannah's art explores a variety of topics, he's been working on a series of family stills since around 2001.

"It's very different," he says of using personal photos as the inspiration for his tableau vivant. "I don't think it's better or worse. It's more challenging in a way. You feel like you're putting yourself out there."

Hannah prefers tableau vivants because of the questions the art poses.

"By making these videos, I enable this conversation about photography and history and the way photography freezes a moment," he said. "I always want people to think, to kind of get pushed back into thinking about themselves."

For his Three Generations exhibit, Hannah hopes to inspire discussion of a different nature.

"There's also this family history element, and we all have completely different and unique histories, but there's also this kind of overlap," he said. "Family photographs are the most prevalent genres of photography and, counter intuitively, they're the most generic in a way. My photo album of my family isn't so different than yours." ■

Adah Hannah: Three Generations runs at the Koffler Gallery, 180 Shaw St. Toronto until June 8. It is part of the Scotiabank Contact Photography Festival.

Stars of David come to life

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Darrin Baker will take to the stage in the Canadian premiere of the musical adaptation of Abigail Pogrebin's Stars of David: Prominent Jews talk about being Jewish running at the Studio Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

The book is a snapshot of Jewish identity told through essays by people such as Joan Rivers, Aaron Sorkin, Gloria Steinem, Gwyneth Paltrow, Dustin Hoffman, Leonard Nimoy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Tony Kushner, Fran Drescher and Kenneth Cole.

"Those essays from the book were then sent out to some of the greatest musical theatre composers," explains Baker. "What came back were these amazing songs based on these prolific people's identities and views on their Judaism – either their culture, faith, religion, community or obligation."

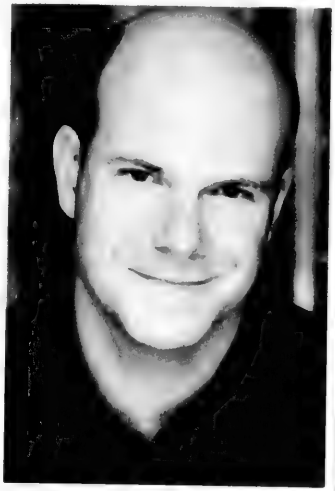
In the show, Baker voices iconic TV producer Norman Lear, entrepreneur Edgar Bronfman Sr., designer Kenneth Cole, musician Michael Feinstein, and director Steven Spielberg.

"What an opportunity for an actor to investigate this cross-span of people," he says. "They are all magnificent in their own respects. What is amazing about the piece is what you start to find out is that their concerns, identities, joys, struggles and obstacles with Judaism are so much like yours and mine."

Baker says it is such a deceiving little show. "It seemingly is a little review but it is kind of epic, even on the basis of who has written it, when you consider that these composers have composed shows like A Chorus Line, Shrek, Next to Normal, Fiddler on the Roof, Miss Saigon. So what's magnificent about this tiny show is that you have all these great composers and lyricists that bring different styles and more importantly they bring different perspectives."

Of all the characters he portrays, he especially identified with Cole. "I married out of the faith as did he," says Baker. "It took him a long time to figure out that Judaism meant much more to him than he thought, sparked by his father's passing and as he started to raise his children, he realized that his children have a heritage that they might not know about unless he figured out a way to impart that, which he has. So, although his children are being raised Roman Catholic, he and his wife's common goal is to give them faith. To them faith is most important and that's one of the universal messages in the show."

Baker says Stars of David is also provocative. "Don't get me wrong, it is not a preachy show in any respect. It is just a human interest show that is fascinating because these people have struggles and their struggles might challenge you to think about your place in all of it."



Darrin Baker

> Their concerns, identities, joys, struggles and obstacles with Judaism are so much like yours and mine

Baker won the Toronto Theatre Critics award for best supporting actor and was nominated for a DORA for best actor in a musical for Falsettos.

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company and Anglewalk Theatre production of Stars of David is directed by Avery Saltzman, with musical direction by Mark Camilleri. It also stars Gabi Epstein, Lisa Horner, and Will Lamond. ■

Jewish film fest promises a little bit for everyone

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

TJFF, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is only one letter away from the acronym of the city's international film festival. The proximity is fitting, though, since TJFF is now more of an international festival than ever before.

The festival, which runs from May 1 through May 11, features 116 diverse titles from 23 countries, as well as a large number of Canadian films, shorts and documentaries.

"We're hoping that people will enjoy the diversity," says festival programmer Jérémie Abessira. "We have a little bit of everything at the festival."

One very high-profile foreign title is Transit, the Philippines' Oscar submission for the foreign language category. The film tells the story of five Filipino families who live as migrants in Israel. Transit's director, Hannah Espia, will be present during the festival.

Also showing on the world cinema front is the short film program From Russia with Falafel, running May 5 and 7, which features four films from Russian Israelis.

"We want to make sure there's not too many films related to a certain theme," says TJFF program manager Stuart Hands. He explains that too many films about the Holocaust or political strife in Israel would not be an accurate indicator of what comprises Jewish cinema around the world.

The festival is also putting an emphasis on Canadian films this year. "We're trying to do a yearly series of films where we screen Canadian Jewish films that have been sitting in archives for ages," Hands says.

Among the obscure Canadian films to be screened are The Wordsmith, directed by Claude Jutra (Mon Oncle Antoine) for CBC from a Mordecai Richler script. The film is about an idealistic writer living on St. Urbain Street in Montreal.

One of the festival's major features in 2014 is a retrospective on Iraqi-Jewish filmmaker Joe Balass. Balass just finished The Length of the Alphabet, an hour-long portrait of Naïm Kattan, an Iraqi-Jewish and French Canadian author.

"It's a look at Jewish identity [and] Montreal and Quebec politics in a way I've never seen before," Hands says of the director's newest film. "Most of the Jewish films we get [from Quebec] are English-speaking Jewish films. It's really a different point of view in terms of representing Montreal."

The TJFF will premiere that film, as well as screen two of Balass's other films about Iraqi-Jewish life, Nana, George and Me and Baghdad Twist, on May 9. Balass will be present at the screenings that day.

Other buzzworthy Canadian titles include The Pin, the first Yiddish film to be produced in Canada. It is a young adult love story set in Lithuania during World War II.

A pair of documentaries at the festival explores the lives of influential Jewish artists from Europe whose names are obscure to North American audiences.

Alexandre Arcady's 24 Days is a true-crime thriller that explores anti-Semitism in France.

Natan is an Irish documentary about Bernard Natan, who helped boost Jewish cinema in France during the 1920s and 1930s as the head of the studio Pathé.

"It's about his dramatic life story as a Jew in cinema in a France with a lot of anti-Semitism," Abessira says. "We always hear about the Jews of Hollywood, yet we've never really heard about any indication of Jews in French cinema."

Lionel Bart: Reviewing the Situation tells the story of the titular Jewish songwriter and composer behind musicals like Oliver! Bart was influenced by Yiddish theatre and synagogue hymns, as much as by Broadway show tunes.

"We're starting to see films dealing with Jews involved in popular culture in other countries," Hands says.

The TJFF is also unveiling a new festival prize, the Micki Moore Award. It goes to the best narrative film from a female director, selected by a jury of industry peers. 2014's winner is For a Woman, a French melodrama from Diane Kurys.

The festival will open and close with films from two beloved directors whose stories could not be more different.

24 Days, directed by Alexandre Arcady, is a true-crime thriller about the kidnapping of Ilan Halimi, a Jewish Moroccan living in Paris, and his family's attempts to get him back. It explores anti-Semitism in France, which remains a hot-button issue. Arcady will be present at the screening, which is also the film's world premiere.

Closing the 22nd annual festival is a different beast, the uproarious comedy Fading Gigolo from director John Turturro. Turturro stars in the film alongside Woody Allen, Modern Family's Sofia Vergara and Sharon Stone.

In Fading Gigolo, which also screened at 2013's Toronto International Film Festival, Allen and Turturro play low-income men who decide to begin a business as a pimp and gigolo to make some extra money.

"Any time we can get a film with Woody Allen and John Turturro, I think it's a great tone to finish with," Hands says.

Other anticipated titles include the indie comedy Marvin, Seth and Stanley, starring Alex Karpovsky (Girls), and Kidon, an Israeli caper thriller that bears similarities to the original Ocean's 11. ■

Names in the News: Filmmaker Yael Reuveny has won the $5,000 David A. Stein Memorial Award for her documentary Farewell Herr Schwarz, which premieres at the upcoming Toronto Jewish Film Festival. The film focuses on a missed postwar reunion at the Lodz train station that haunted three generations of her family. It screens May 5 at 2:30 p.m. and May 8 at 6 p.m.; details at tjff.com.

Also, filmmaker Diane Kurys has won the $5,000 Micki Moore Award for her most recent film, For A Woman, which is a "lush and well-made melodrama" that offers a new perspective on Jewish life in postwar France. It screens May 4 and May 11.

Names in the News II: The Association of Canadian Jewish Studies has named Adam Fuerstenberg, professor emeritus at Ryerson University, as the recipient of the 2014 Louis Rosenberg Award for distinguished service in the field of Canadian Jewish studies. Fuerstenberg is being honoured for his role as a "literary scholar of Yiddish Canadian literature" as well as his achievement in establishing both the Canadian Jewish Book Awards and the Parchment literary journal. The ceremony is May 25 at Brock University, St. Catharines.

Ten-year-old Itzhak Perlman receiving the Sharett Scholarship in Israel, about 1955. An autographed photo of the event is being auctioned off at a performance May 22.

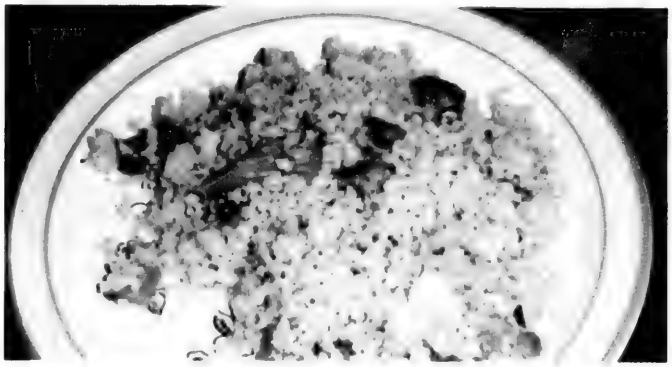
New ways with grains

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's amazing how healthy and tasty often go hand in hand. Case in point, grain recipes. Grains of all kinds are incredibly healthy for you – they're chock full of fibre and loaded with vitamins, minerals and antioxidants. That's all beside the point if you don't make them part of your diet or you see them as too "earnest" or even, (heavens!) stodgy.

Grains come in many forms and adapt to an encyclopedic array of flavours. I've paired the chewy, nutty goodness of farro, an Italian ancient grain, with roasted sweet vegetables and an acidic vinaigrette for a great side dish. I have found that if you get pearled farro, you can omit the overnight soak. That way, it only takes about 25 minutes for farro to cook. Quinoa cakes – great for breakfast with fruit and yogurt, are terrific topped with salsa or even wonderful as a "hamburger" with regular condiments. Here's to a whole new way with grains. ■



Farro with Roasted Cauliflower, Carrots and Cherry Tomatoes

Farro, an Italian ancient grain, retains its chewiness and nuttiness when cooked. It can be made up to 24 hours in advance and is great hot, warm or at room temperature. Try to buy pearled farro to avoid an overnight soak.

- ❑ 1 small head cauliflower, cut into 1-in. pieces (about 6 cups)
- ❑ 2 carrots, peeled and sliced
- ❑ 3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
- ❑ 1cup cherry tomatoes
- ❑ 1cup semi-pearled farro

Dressing:

- ❑ 1 tbsp. sherry vinegar
- ❑ 1 tsp. honey
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. dried thyme
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
- ❑ 1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil

Preheat the oven to 400. Line a large, rimmed baking sheet with aluminum foil. In a large bowl, toss together cauliflower and carrots with olive oil, salt and pepper until well coated. Spread onto prepared baking sheet. Roast in the centre of the preheated oven for 35 minutes, stirring once or twice. Stir in cherry tomatoes. Roast for 10 to 15 minutes or until vegetables are very tender and lightly browned. Meanwhile, bring 2-1/2 cups of lightly salted water to a boil. Stir in farro. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 25 minutes or until farro is tender but still chewy. Drain well. Gently toss together farro and vegetables in a serving bowl.

In a separate small bowl, whisk together vinegar, honey, thyme, salt and pepper. In a thin steady stream, gradually whisk in the olive oil. Pour dressing over farro mixing, tossing gently until well coated. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

Quinoa Cakes

Great on their own as a side dish, these cakes need a bit of dressing up, in the form of some salsa, gravy or topping. They are incredibly easy to make and freeze exceptionally well.

- ❑ 1 cup raw quinoa
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 tsp. paprika
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. each dried oregano and dried basil
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ vegetable oil

Rinse quinoa in a fine mesh sieve. Combine with 2 cups water in a saucepan set over medium-high heat. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for 15 to 18 minutes or until tender and water is absorbed. Transfer to a bowl. Stir in salt, paprika, oregano, basil, pepper and eggs, mixing well.

Heat about 1/8-in. of oil in a large skillet set over medium-high heat. Using a 1/4-cup measuring cup or scoop, scoop out quinoa mixture. Gently "plop" into skillet; flatten into a 1/4-in. cake. Repeat with remaining quinoa, making sure not to crowd the pan – you should be able to fry about 6 cakes at once. Cook cakes for 3 minutes per side or until golden. Makes 12 cakes. ■

Tales from Bathurst Manor

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I hadn't heard of Stuart Ross before reading Snowball, Dragonfly, Jew. I was therefore surprised to find that we are landsleit – both from Bathurst Manor – and that he is quite prolific, with more than a dozen books and published anthologies under his belt.

How to describe his writing? One needs many adjectives, including: funny, eccentric, poetic, childlike, surreal and experimental. If you drew a Venn diagram, this book might be situated at the place where Leonard Cohen's Beautiful Losers, Jack Kerouac's On The Road, Franz Kafka's Metamorphosis and loads of old comic books, Hardy Boy adventure mysteries, and 1960s movies and TV shows all come together.

At first, Snowball, Dragonfly, Jew seems just a series of light comic sketches, but soon it broadens pleasingly into a quirky quasi-novel. The setting is the heavily Jewish north-Toronto suburb of Bathurst Manor of several decades ago – home, not incidentally, to one of the Diaspora's largest communities of Holocaust survivors.

Ben, our first-person protagonist, recounts a series of striking and bizarre boyhood incidents, misadventures and fantasies, all of which helped shape his world. He tells us of the raccoon that ate his pet catfish, the enormous dragonfly that landed on his leg while he was floating in a lake, the anti-Semitic bully who forced him to tear a paperback book to pieces, and his grandfather's false teeth that he soaked in an old yahrzeit glass each night.

Ben attended cheder at Beth Emeth, where he was taught about 12 saintly rabbis who chose martyrdom rather than betray their Torah and their Judaism. In his childish recollection, the rabbis are variously thrown off a cliff, lowered into a vat of boiling oil, crushed by a falling weight, fed to alligators and starving wolves, and so on. Yet none betrayed their faith. Ben imagines he could not live up to the example set by these Jewish paragons if confronted by anti-Semitic Christian boys on the way home from cheder.

"I pictured them wearing Boy Scout outfits. They say to me, Ben, give up your Jewish god and become Christians like us, or we'll kill you right now. I think of potato latkes and jelly fruit slices, and of my grandfather's dentures floating in a glass by the sink, and of my mother sitting on the edge of my bed and telling me how all her aunts and uncles were killed by Hitler, and of my father slathering horseradish upon his lump of gefilte fish at the Passover seder, and of my mother getting pelted with snowballs because she's four years old and she speaks Yiddish. Then I think of being dead. Nothing happens when you're dead, and you're not even aware that nothing is happening, because you're dead.

"The reason I feel guilty is because I don't think I would be as brave as those rabbis."

Ben is obsessed with the memory of his mother, doomed with terminal cancer, going to Bathurst Manor Plaza with a gun and shooting a known Nazi sympathizer on the sidewalk outside Faggot's Hardware.

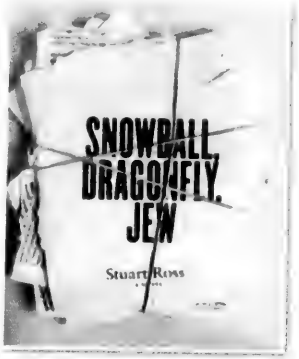
Is it a false memory or did his mother really commit the murder and then coolly drive away? Ben thinks he cannot get to the bottom of the mystery. Both his parents have died and his only sibling, Jake, has been institutionalized after losing almost all of his memory like a hard-drive wiped clean.

The adult Ben becomes a performance artist who does strange things like submerge himself up to his head in a vat of ketchup in a store window; he muses that ketchup, according to the Hollywood convention, is actually blood.

Ben weaves the actress Kim Novak and her role in the movie Vertigo into his childhood memories. Novak becomes one of the characters and Ben has imaginary conversations with her as though she, or at least her movie character, has been recalled to life.

Similarly, by the time this off-beat but entertaining book is done, all the main characters – Ben, mother, father, Jake, grandmother, grandfather – also seem vividly alive, as if floating eerily in the sky above Wilmington Plaza.

You don't have to come from Bathurst Manor to appreciate the humour and depth of these seemingly light-hearted sketches.



Snowball, Dragonfly, Jew
Stuart Ross

(ECW Press)

One hundred years after his birth in 1914, acclaimed novelist and short-story writer Bernard Malamud has been surprisingly overlooked by biographers – in large part because his family had blocked access to his private papers. But in recent years the family has repented of this action and is co-operating with British literary scholar Philip Davis who has a major biography of Malamud (an expansion of an earlier work) in progress.

Malamud, who died in 1986, wrote a handful of acclaimed novels, including The Natural, The Fixer and The Assistant, as well as hordes of fabulous short stories. The Pulitzer-Prize-winning author's name often appears alongside the names Philip Roth and Saul Bellow, but his reputation may have slipped somewhat due to the lack of scholarly attention. Or so muses his daughter, Janna Malamud Smith, in the preface to My Father Is A Book.

Malamud-Smith now uses all available material at her disposal to present the sort of memoir that she once vowed she would never write. The book is very much a daughter's recollection, not the empirical study that we expect eventually from Davis.

The son of immigrant shopkeepers in Brooklyn, Bernard Malamud spent his formative years, before his daughter was born, with his family in a town in Oregon. Despite the limitations of her perspective, Malamud-Smith succeeds in painting a three-dimensional portrait of a passionate and complex human being immersed in his literary art.

If you've enjoyed some of Malamud's novels and short stories and want to know more about the man, this intimate, if overlong, memoir should satisfy. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Date night is like glue

Lauren Kramer

We were in shul when I heard my daughter Maya, 5, speak loudly and clearly in a voice that is certainly mine. She's made two paper airplanes, handed one to a cousin and christened them "man" and "woman." "Let's leave the kids at home and go out for dinner, just you and me," she suggests to the "male" airplane.

I recognize those words immediately and am stunned, first into silence, then laughter and then denial. "I don't say that very often," I begin tentatively, trying to recall the last time we actually did head out on a spur-of-the-moment dinner without the children. "Oh yes, you do!" she retorts.

Maya's words ring in my ears for the rest of the day and the days that follow. At first I'm disturbed that her first thoughts, when playing "mom," are to escape the kids. Is that how she sees me? As a mother who can't wait to get away?

I'm comforted, though, that on some level she gets it: moms and dads need time to themselves to enjoy each other without the presence of their children. She might have launched into a different dialogue with her male airplane, say, about how he was working too much or not helping enough around the house. Perhaps I should be grateful that the first thought in her head, when playing the role of a mother, was "date night!"

Managing a relationship with your spouse is an ongoing challenge with kids in the house. In our home, when the children were younger, the witching hour – with its feeding, bathing and sleeping dramas – meant any down time was spent in shell-shocked recovery mode from the hours that preceded it. Now that infancy is well behind us, the struggle is in getting the kids to go to bed and stay there at a decent hour so that we can have at least a glimpse of an evening to ourselves. Many times, the only way to have an uninterrupted conversation of any depth is to close the front door and head out.

It's something we don't do often enough.

When we do, though, the harried parents frustrated by kids who don't listen shed their skins. They clasp each other's hands and walk into the cold, quiet night air as a man and a woman who share stories about their week and find peace and comfort in each other's company. We're reminded what a beautiful thing our partnership is, especially so when it has the space to breathe, strengthen and rejuvenate.

Because kids are great, but they can also deplete reserves of patience and tolerance. With those in low supply, the memory of a relationship between two adults that preceded the kids' arrival recedes as well. And it's the marriage, and the love within it that sustains, nurtures and adheres the whole family structure.

The stats on marriage survival in Canada are not pretty. Some 41 per cent of all marriages end in divorce before their 30th anniversary, says Statistics Canada. Where do they go wrong? How does dewy love head south to disinterest, dislike and, eventually, disassociation? Where does the communication break down, and how do we prevent that from happening?

Maybe more guilt-free date nights and weekends away sans kids are the key to keeping it together. A couple's relationship requires oxygenation to keep it balanced and happy, after all. Maybe the marriage should be given more space in the family so that couples remember why they chose each other to begin with.

In hindsight, I'm not ashamed to admit it: though I love my kids to bits, I also want to ditch them every now and then and breeze out the door with my husband. It's a tonic, a gift we give our partnership and one that helps us keep the glue of the family together. Without that glue, it's a slippery slope downhill. ■

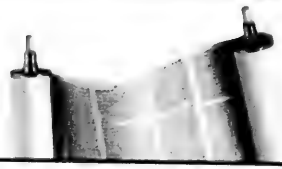
Emor | Leviticus 21:1 - 24:23



Maharat Rachel Kohl Feingold says Shabbat is a day to unplug from our distractions
Rabbi Denise Handlarski on the challenge to empower, rather than harm, others
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen explains sfirat haOmer as a reminder to not waste our time

Maharat Rachel Kohl Feingold

In our home, we try to enforce a "no phones at the table" rule – not for our children, who are still young and don't have cellphones – but for my husband and me. Our phones distract us with email and texts. We put them away during dinner so that our kids know they have our full attention.

However, those 20 minutes at dinner stand in contrast to the rest of the day. We live in a society of divided attention. Hundreds of distractions prevent us from focusing on the present.

Parshat Emor contains one of several places in the Torah where we're commanded to keep Shabbat. The verse says, "Six days shall work be done, but the seventh day is the Sabbath." (Lev. 33:3) The great chassidic master Rabbi Elimelech of Lizhensk (1717-1787) notes this odd grammatical choice. It might have said that for six days, you shall do work, and on the seventh you shall rest, as the verses do elsewhere. The use of the passive verb involves a simple change in vowel for the Hebrew – te'aseh instead of ta'aseh – but the sentence takes on an entirely different meaning.

Rabbi Elimelech says that during the week, our work is done passively. We act out of habit and lack focus on what we're doing. It's as if the work completes itself, without our conscious involvement. On Shabbat, we remove the distractions of everyday life and focus on every moment. When we act more consciously, we obtain a greater depth of awareness and pay closer attention to what's most important – family, community, and godliness.

Shabbat is a day to "unplug" from our distractions, to stay present from moment to moment. Perhaps if we cultivate that ability on Shabbat, it can spill over into the rest of the week. ■

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold is director of education and spiritual enrichment at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Parshat Emor challenges us to confront aspects of our textual tradition that don't conform to our contemporary values. Simultaneously, it includes aspects that we continue to celebrate. The beginning of the parshah concerns priestly purity. These rules present sexist attitudes – any "harlot" of the priestly line is to be put to death (21:9) – and ableist attitudes – no offspring of Aaron with a "defect" may serve (21:18). While we object to the types of stratifications being established here – man above woman, able-bodied above those with disabilities, we also might remember that power always engenders hierarchy. The priests were the leaders of their time and, therefore, sought to establish authority and superiority. Emor challenges me as a rabbi, and anyone in a position of Jewish leadership, to consider how to use our power to empower, rather than harm, others.

There are discomfiting aspects of Torah, but also aspects that anchor us to our tradition. Emor describes rituals for some of our earliest holidays, including Yom Kippur and Sukkot. In the discussion of the harvest, we're told to leave the gleanings for the poor and the stranger (23:22). This not only encourages us to view our Judaism through the lens of doing social good, but also links that social good to the commemoration and celebration of our holidays. Thus, our identities and practices are bound up with our imperative to be moral. To me, this is the true value of Judaism: that which makes me who I am also inspires me to do good in the world, and as I aim to do good in the world, I am continually made better as a person and as a Jew. To both challenge and inspire is the nature of Torah. Emor does both, giving us much food for thought this Shabbat. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

In Parshat Emor, we learn about the special mitzvah of sfirat haOmer, the counting of the Omer, which we count for 49 days from the second night of Pesach until Shavuot. Every night we count another day.

When the Jewish People came out of Egypt, God told them he would give them his treasure, the Torah, in seven weeks. With excitement, they counted every single day.

Sfirah doesn't only mean to count. It also comes from the word safir, which means to shine.

The Jews were in a very low spiritual state when they came out of Egypt, being in slavery under the Egyptians. When they finally did leave, they were not yet ready for the great revelation of the Exodus. However, from then on, they worked on improving themselves, so that they would shine (safir), in order to be ready to receive the Torah.

So, too, every year, we also need to count the days before Shavuot in order to appreciate what we have – that God gave us his precious Torah. When we count, it reminds us that time is precious. Let's not waste time. Let's use every day that God gives us as a gift.

With every new day, let's shine, by learning more Torah and doing more mitzvot. Tomorrow should be an even better day than today. Finally, after 49 days of counting and improving ourselves, we'll be ready to receive the Torah.

So let's improve by being nicer to our spouses, by learning more Torah with our kids, by respecting each other more, and by being more careful with keeping Shabbat and keeping kosher. With God's help, may we merit not only the receiving of the Torah on Shavuot, but also receiving the Mashiach speedily in our days! ■

Joe Schwarcz: Making science palatable

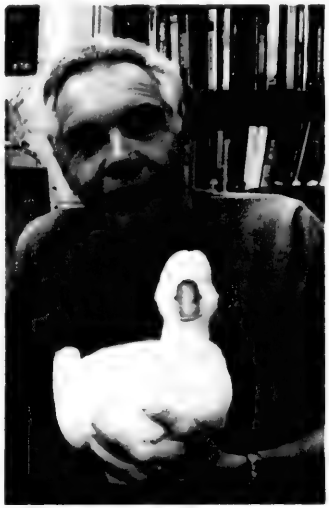
dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Millions know him as "Dr. Joe," the McGill University chemistry professor who has spent the last 30 years popularizing science, exposing frauds, charlatans and quacks, and defending the scientific method with passion, wit and clarity. For the last 15 years, Schwarcz has conducted a lot of his work from the McGill Office of Science and Society in campus quarters lined with several thousand science books and dozens of rubber ducky "quacks" he's collected.

Schwarcz, 66, also travels widely, is an in-demand public speaker, writes a weekly column for the Montreal Gazette, and hosts a popular radio science call-in show, The Right Chemistry on CJAD radio. His 14th book, Is That a Fact?: Frauds, Quacks, and the Real Science of Everyday Life (ECW Press), is due out this month. All his previous books have been bestsellers in Canada.



"Dr. Joe" Schwarcz holds a "quack" at his McGill University office.

All your books seem similar in that they try to bring science to the average person. How is your latest book different?

Mostly, it's where the emphasis is. The theme is always the same in all my books: how to make science interesting and palatable without trivializing it – a book you can open at any page, and you say, "That's interesting," and you keep reading. The challenge is to make it interesting, make it palatable, and still have quality in it in terms of the science. Most of my books have had, as a theme, "separating sense and nonsense."

You've divided the book into categories, black for scientific non-fact, white for fact and grey for somewhere in-between.

Unfortunately a lot of science actually is grey, because the issues are not ironclad – there's always more to be learned. That's one of the beauties of science: it approaches the finish line but never quite gets there. But we do have final answers in the area of nonsense, what I call "black." There's a lot of stuff out there that's just not debatable, absolute crap.

Do your books preach mostly to the converted?

That's hard to say. I suspect most of my readers are random, interested people. It won't be the naturopaths or homeopaths who read it. But they might pick it up to see what the enemy is saying.

I guess there's no sense in debating someone religious about the existence of God.

Right. You can talk to them about things that you know you can debate, but not about faith. There's a big difference between science and faith, and science cannot overcome – and doesn't even need to try to overcome – faith.

How do you explain scientists who wear kippot?

Just because they wear a kippah or are religious doesn't mean they don't follow the science. I would say that there would be very few scientists – certainly Jewish scientists – who believe the Bible literally. There are many Jewish scientists who have great faith and believe in God, but they also respect the science and understand that the world, in fact, is billions of years old, and that Adam and Eve might have been a couple of microbes.

How would an observant Jewish anthropologist in Israel reconcile the faith belief that the universe is 6,000 years old with the anthropological facts?

I have no answer to that, how anyone could reconcile that, how you could throw away all of the evidence. The argument they could make is that when God created the world 6,000 years ago, He also created the fossils that look like they are billions of years old. But there's that small group who believe that the seven days [of Creation] really meant seven, 24-hour days. Most rabbis I have spoken to don't believe that literally. Faith versus science is not debatable because science is not based on faith. Science is based on evidence. And faith by definition is belief without needing evidence.

What type of reaction do you get to your columns and books?

It's 99 per cent positive. It takes me a year to write one book. You can read it from any point and find it interesting. And a little bit of humour makes the medicine go down. I started my radio show in 1980. It is the longest-running radio show on chemistry in the world – as well as the only one.

Why does it seem that, increasingly, you see homeopathic treatments (infinitesimal levels of a supposed active ingredient "dissolved" into huge quantities of water) being allowed at medical clinics or doctors' offices?

It's absolutely bizarre. It's kind of that the public has the right to be wrong, and if this is their wish, then there are people who will fulfil it. How anyone with any kind of scientific training can buy into homeopathy is completely beyond me. Most people think homeopathy is "alternative medicine." It is not. Homeopathy is scientifically absurd, and there's no evidence for it except for the placebo effect, which is not something you should sweep under the carpet. My main objection is that teaching something that is scientifically absurd is never right, even if there is some positive outcome. The other objection is that it sidetracks people from effective treatments.

Have you ever been accused of being in the pocket of the pharmaceutical industry and the like?

Yes, it's happened, but I can't really afford to pay attention to nonsense. One of the reasons my office is respected and listened to is that we are unbiased and don't get any funding from anyone. And it's not in my financial interest to promote or destroy homeopathy. The only allegiance I have is to the scientific method. Scientists are accused of having blinders on, closed minds, but that it isn't true at all. It's just a question of "show me." ■

Memories of Herb Gray

Backstory

IRVING ABELLA

Former MP Herb Gray had passions – democracy, Canada, Parliament, the Liberal party, the Jewish People. He loved each of them, and he devoted his public life defending and invigorating all of them.

Everyone who knew Herb has a favourite memory of him. Mine are meeting him at various lectures and conferences on Jewish topics in Ottawa – he seems to have gone to all of them, especially after he resigned from Parliament. He always sat in the front row to greet and chat with as many members of the audience as there was time for, and to make sure he could hear the speaker.

I spoke at some of these events, and what I loved best was talking about the difference between the Canadian and American Jewish communities and how much more involved in politics were the latter. In America, for example, there were more than 50 Jews in Congress, while in Canada there were only three in the House of Commons. I also pointed out that the first Jew named to a cabinet position in the United States was by Teddy Roosevelt some 100 years ago, while "the first Jew selected to a Canadian cabinet was so recent he is here with us tonight."

Whereupon Herb would stand and acknowledge the enthusiastic and affectionate applause from everyone in the room. It was a moment of great spontaneity, and Herb loved it – every time it happened, and it happened often.

For the Jewish community Herb was a trailblazer. Not only was he the first to be in cabinet, he was also the first – and still the only – Jew to serve as leader of the opposition, if only briefly following the resignation of Liberal leader John Turner in 1990. He was also the only Jew ever to act as deputy prime minister of Canada, allowing him to stand in for the prime minister in Parliament and cabinet meetings when he was away. And when he gave up his seat, he was the longest continuously serving member of Parliament in Canadian history.

Herb was a bit of a homer, inordinately proud of his native town of Windsor, Ont., and especially proud of its contribution to Canadian Jewry. He reminded me whenever we spoke that Windsor was a city of Jewish firsts. Aside from his achievements, in the 1930s, another Windsor Jew, David Croll, was the first Jewish mayor of a major Canadian city, and the first to sit in a provincial cabinet, as minister of public welfare and labour, in Ontario from 1934 to 1937. In 1955 Croll became the first Jew appointed to the Canadian senate. Not bad, Herb was fond of saying, for a Jewish community of a few thousand. And who could argue with that.

Herb's appointment to cabinet by Pierre Trudeau in 1968 was a turning point for the Jewish community. For the first 100 years of Canada's history since Confederation, Jews were kept out of the country's mainstream. For much of that period, they were the considered the pariahs of Canadian society, despised, demeaned, discriminated against, targets of abuse, excluded from many professions and schools, and legally prevented from living and vacationing in a wide variety of areas from coast to coast.

The Canada Herb Gray grew up in was permeated by racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism, which was only just beginning to lift by the 1950s. It was his generation that finally broke through the quotas and restrictions that constrained and overwhelmed Canadian Jewry. With the help of suddenly sympathetic politicians and courts, Jewish leaders, veterans and trade unionists successfully lobbied to end discriminatory policies against minorities, thus opening up Canadian society not only for themselves, but for other ethnic and immigrant groups as well.

By the 1960s, a new era had dawned. For the first time in the nation's history, there were Jewish deputy ministers, university presidents, members of corporate boards, including banks, hospital chiefs of staff, and partners in major downtown law firms. Only Parliament seemed immune. And then Herb's elevation to cabinet opened doors for his fellow Jews. Within a few years, he was joined by three more in cabinet, a Jewish premier in British Columbia, a leader of a national political party and several provincial ministers.

Thanks to Herb, the 100 year logjam had finally been broken. ■

Jojne "Jack" Weisdorf

Passed away peacefully in his 95th year on Saturday, April 12 of Nissan, and was buried the following day in the Wierzbniker section of Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery. Shiva was held at son Albert's home. He will be missed by his loving children Albert (Brenda), Mara (Tishchenko), Yura, Mark (Lorraine Bell), and Sandy (Stephen Hall); grandchildren Richard & Carolyn, Ola & Tanya, Katya, Lisa & Kayla, and Matthew; and four great grandchildren, as well as his brother Moishe.

Dad/Zaidy survived the Holocaust by escaping to the former U.S.S.R, returning to Poland to learn that most of his family had perished. Helped by his brother Moishe, who came to Canada in 1936, and other family members, Jojne, his then wife, and sons Albert and Mark arrived in Canada in July 1960.

Jack loved people and life.The Weisdorfs, Wierzbniker Society and Toronto Jewish Folk Choir were all part of his extended family; music, singing, poetry, dancing and celebrations were amongst his passions. He passed away as family and friends were gathering in Toronto for Passover - where he had always led and enjoyed the Seder story telling, prayer, song, wine and food. This Passover, Dad/Zaidy Jojne once again played a central role in our celebration of the Seder. The family asks that those wishing to make donations in Jack's memory, consider the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto.

A questionable media law and a cardinal's Jewish roots

Actor, director starred in iconic films

Filmmaker and actor Assi Dayan, son of Israeli icon Moshe Dayan, was found dead in his Tel Aviv home May 1 at 68. He reportedly suffered from serious health problems. Dayan appeared in some 50 Israeli films and TV series, and directed at least 16 films, including classics such as Halfon Hill Doesn't Answer, and Life According to Agfa. In recent years, he starred in the popular drama B'Tipul, or In Treatment, which was adapted for U.S. TV.

Shul politics would have done him in Cardinal John O'Connor, the late archbishop of New York, was technically Jewish, new research says. His sister, Mary O'Connor Ward, recently discovered through genealogical research that her mother, Dorothy Gumple O'Connor, was born Jewish but converted to Catholicism before she met and married the cardinal's father. Ward told the Catholic New York newspaper she doesn't know whether the late cardinal, who died in 2000 at age 80, knew his mother had been Jewish. Ward said her mother never spoke about her roots, but when she was growing up, she "surmised" her mother was a convert.

But could Cardinal John O'Connor give a good Rosh Hashanah sermon?

Cardinal O'Connor had close ties with New York's Jewish community, often describing Jews as Catholics' "elder brothers." He also marched in protests to free Soviet Jews, visited the site of the Dachau concentration camp and joined Jews in commemorating the Holocaust.

Freedom is never paying for your news

The pro-Likud freebie newspaper Israel Hayom fought back last week against a bill that would outlaw free distribution of major daily papers with a slew of opinion pieces slamming the proposed law. The paper has become Israel's most popular daily since its 2007 launch. Last month MKs from seven parties – but none from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud – co-sponsored the bill that clearly targets Israel Hayom, which is owned by pro-Republican U.S. casino magnate Sheldon Adelson. If passed, Israel Hayom would have to start charging for copies. ■

Former MPs recall Herb Gray

As former parliamentarians and current board members of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), we were saddened to hear of the passing of former deputy prime minister Herb Gray – someone who exemplified the Jewish tradition of civic engagement.

We had the privilege of serving in Parliament during Herb's tenure, and can attest to the universal respect he garnered on the Hill as a committed public servant. We fondly remember his good nature, his humour, and his dedication to his community and country alike, both of which he represented with honour and dignity.

Remembering Herb Gray

Herb Gray and I lived in the Rho Pi Phi Fraternity House in Toronto during our school years, and he was my roommate. I remember Herb very well, and we became close friends over the years. As a student Herb made a deep impression upon all of us at the frat house. He was very serious, yet with a sense of good humour. He was down to earth and totally dedicated to his legal studies.

We knew that he would go far in politics, but we could not imagine his meteoric rise in Parliament. He was re-elected 13 times, without interruption, a great record by itself. Despite his success, his warm personality and easy approach never changed. He set an example of statesman-like behaviour for all politicians to follow.

It is much to the credit of Canada, that a young and brilliant Jewish lawyer from Windsor reached the pinnacle of service to his country by becoming the deputy prime minister of Canada, admired and respected by all.

Liberal record disputed

MP Marc Garneau's letter ("What Trudeau said," The CJN, April 24), belies the actual record of the Liberal party regarding the State of Israel. That record is clear: for decades under the Liberals, Canada either abstained or voted in favour of numerous one-sided resolutions attacking Israel in both the UN General Assembly and Security Council. Based on the platitudes offered by Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, I see no reason to believe that this would change should the Liberals ever come to power again.

If the Conservatives were indeed focusing on electoral expedience in determining foreign policy, it would make sense for them to focus on Canada's large Muslim community rather that the tiny Jewish community. The fact that they do the opposite is testimony to the Conservative government's principled stand in this matter.

Furthermore, Trudeau's contention that the Iranian people have democratic aspirations appears based on some typically naive and dreamy world-view garnered from the back of a motorcycle.

Were the vast majority of the Iranian people not supporting the mullahs in Tehran as they have for decades, they would no longer be in power. And if Iranians in Canada, in fact, oppose the Iranian regime and its murderous plans for Israel, where is their voice?

Israel guilty of 'pinkwashing'

As a director of the Centre for Gender Advocacy, as well as a member of Independent Jewish Voices, I applaud both groups for the principled positions they have taken ("Protest tries to shut down pro-Israel gay activist," The CJN, April 10).

These groups, and I as an individual, condemn Israeli state policies that violate human rights and that do not reflect serious commitments to justice and inclusiveness. Selecting isolated examples in attempts to show Israeli superiority, as in claiming how much better queers are treated there than elsewhere in the Middle East, is indeed to "pinkwash" their illegal (as ruled by the International Court of Justice) policies and practices.

This obscures the way many women are treated in Israel, how necessary health services are precluded for those held up at checkpoints, and how not all living within Israel have equal civil rights, to say nothing of the continuing occupation of Palestinian territory. ■

RABBI-2-RABBI

The challenge of intermarriage

When a Jew marries out of the faith, is it the end of the road, or can subsequent generations still be Jewish?

Rabbi N.Daniel Korobkin
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: The latest Pew Survey on Jews in America contains a few dark clouds for the future of North American Jewry. Rabbi Grushcow, as a Reform rabbi, you represent the Jewish movement to which the highest percentage of U.S. Jews affiliate. But is that really a victory when more than half of marriages since 2000 have been intermarriages? How do we as a Jewish community respond to the alarming figure of 22 per cent of American Jews who now profess to be Jews of "no religion"?

Rabbi Grushcow: I don't see these numbers in terms of victory or defeat. Rather, I think they raise important issues for us all. For example, intermarriage is far from limited to Reform Jews. As a movement, though, we have made the decision to welcome and support everyone who wants to build a Jewish family. That includes a lot of couples where one spouse isn't Jewish. I continue to be inspired by how many non-Jewish parents are dedicated to raising Jewish kids.

Rabbi Korobkin: I also try to be optimistic, as do you, rabbi. But whereas you are inspired by intermarried families that raise their children as Jewish, I see defeat and failure. The cornerstone of Jewish continuity is when two Jews marry and raise their children Jewish. I don't believe that this continuity and Jewish legacy can be maintained when only one parent is Jewish, and I think both history and our own observations bear this out. While there are the occasional exceptions, even exceptional exceptions, they don't support the rule.

Rabbi Grushcow: We see very different realities in our different communities. At Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, non-Jewish parents of Jewish children are part of the very fabric of our synagogue's life, and they add to our community in immeasurable ways. More and more, we see people opting into Judaism, whether or not they pursue conversion. When we look to our history (even going back to inscriptions in ancient synagogues), we learn that in many eras, non-Jews have been supporters of the synagogue and of Jewish life. As long as we see intermarriage as the end of the road, we will close our doors to people who would otherwise come in. When we open the doors, we don't just accommodate exceptions to the rule, but the rules themselves change. I often think of the talmudic dictum that we should only judge by what our own eyes see. In that sense, I am very optimistic about Jewish life, and I am continually impressed by the people who find their way to us.

Rabbi Korobkin: Don't get me wrong: I agree that intermarried families can contribute a great deal to the fabric of a Jewish community, so I'm not negating your experience. I've noted that at times, they are even more enthusiastic to make a difference, since they have to compensate for the greater challenge in providing Jewish identity to their families. My point is, rather, that when we look at the bigger picture of Jewish continuity, about what makes Judaism perpetuate from generation to generation, history shows us that once a Jew marries out of the faith, the chances of his or her Judaism continuing beyond a generation or two approaches nil. You know the old rabbinic commentary to the four sons at the seder: Each "son" represents a succeeding generation within the same family. Where's the fifth son, the fifth generation? The fourth son's Judaism became so diluted that he intermarried, so the fifth son doesn't even bother showing up to the seder. Yes, we never give up on any Jew, even the intermarried Jew. But looking at the Pew study's cold statistics gives one a shiver.

Rabbi Grushcow: I don't think the fifth son disappears because of intermarried parents. We have many families at the temple who have had intermarriages in every generation and stayed deeply connected to synagogue and Jewish life. I think the fifth son disappears when we take Judaism for granted, or base it entirely on nostalgia. Interfaith families, and others who consciously choose a Jewish path, have to think about why they are Jewish and what form their Judaism takes. This, to me, can be a source of strength, even if it can be a more difficult path. ■

CJN wins Rockower Award

The American Jewish Press Association (AJPA) has recognized The CJN with a first-place Simon Rockower Award for excellence in editorial writing in 2013.

The paper submitted three editorials written by Mordechai Ben-Dat for consideration: "Strengthen our unity" (Jan. 3, 2013), "Summit on Education" (Feb. 14) and "Renewing our vows" (May 14).

The first dealt with the issue of accommodating non-Orthodox prayer at the Western Wall, while the second spoke of the need for the community to convene a summit to deal with the high cost of Jewish education. The third urged Jewish leaders to continue to strengthen the infrastructure of communal life, pointing to the need for adequate Jewish education for all children and the importance of maintaining The CJN as a community newspaper.

The AJPA is planning to hold its 2014 annual conference in conjunction with the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly in Washington D.C., Nov. 9 to 11.

An invitation to COR: our door is still open

Over the past eight months, The CJN has investigated the veracity of a series of rumours, insinuations and allegations regarding the practices of the Kashruth Council of Canada, known colloquially as COR. Primarily, CJN reporter Paul Lungen sought to examine long-circulated claims that COR stifles competition in Toronto's kosher certification market. This week, The CJN presents part one of "Behind the Label," a three-part series detailing what he found.

Lungen spoke to owners of kosher businesses, including food manufacturers and caterers, and the stories they related about their dealings with COR certainly suggest something is awry. Many told of ever-changing rules and regulations, rising fee structures and false claims about what is and what is not kosher.

Meanwhile, Badatz Toronto, an upstart kosher certifier, charges that COR has threatened kosher businesses under its supervision or those considering a switch that if they moved to Badatz, their products would be off limits wherever COR is the sanctioning body.

Next week, Behind the Label continues with a look at how COR's practices may be affecting the price you pay for kosher products such as chicken and meat. One of the founders of Badatz alleges that kosher food produced in Toronto "costs consumers 10 to 15 per cent higher [than it otherwise would] because of COR." And in two weeks, the series concludes with a look at what the future may hold for kosher supervision in Toronto.

It's worth noting, though, that the co-owner of one of Toronto's largest kosher caterers described his company's relationship with COR to The CJN as "collegial" and that among COR's chief critics are two former employees, neither of whom left the organization on good terms. That's precisely why we sought out COR's version of events during the course of this investigation and why we were so disappointed when it refused to comment.

Instead, COR elected to run an advertisement in this week's newspaper (the ad ran in another Toronto-based Jewish newspaper some weeks ago, after COR was made aware of the investigation and was offered the opportunity to respond), which begins: "The Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) would like to take this opportunity to initiate a dialogue with the community about our services and in the interests of transparency, discuss our fee structure, our business model and the origins of our organization." It's a terrific sentiment, but forgive us for wondering why, if that's the case, COR rejected The Canadian Jewish News' invitation.

The CJN has been accused of committing a chillul HaShem (the biblical prohibition against desecrating God's name) for undertaking this investigation, and the indictments will likely multiply in the coming weeks. Make no mistake: we are sensitive to such concerns. We want to emphasize that the imperative to not make a chillul HaShem – to, in fact, produce the opposite, a kiddush HaShem – informed the reporting process and decision to publish.

Ultimately, our goal and that of COR would seem to be the same: to establish an open discussion about kosher supervision in Toronto. So I'll conclude by re-extending the offer to COR: if you want to talk on the record, we'll be happy to hear from you. It's not too late to tell your side of the story. ■ – YONI

Holocaust education in Canada uneven at best

Naomi Azrieli

The Holocaust has become a global reference point for education in many subject areas beyond Jewish, European and world history – human rights, international law, responsible citizenship and the role of the state in societies, to name a few.

The very premise of a recently published UNESCO report on Holocaust education is that its importance lies not only in learning about the systematic murder of more than six million men, women and children in the heart of Europe's most civilized and modern societies, but also in the universality of its lessons and their relevance to present-day issues. Holocaust education has a critical role to play in building tolerance, instilling respect for human dignity and promoting appreciation for diversity.

So it seems fitting in this month of remembrance – Yom Hashoah, the 70th anniversary of the destruction of the Jewish community in Hungary, the 20th anniversary of the genocide in Rwanda – to take a look at the state of Holocaust education in Canada. The imperative to educate students about the Holocaust has never been stronger, as is the urgency to provide them with the tools to grapple with this complex history and questions of morality and social responsibility.

A recently published study by Université de Montréal researchers Sivane Hirsch and Marie McAndrew on the dearth of Holocaust education in Quebec, and the near absence of the Holocaust from its textbooks, raises much concern. Superficial or partial treatment prevents Quebec's students from fully grasping the impact of this historical event on contemporary society.

Yet of even greater concern is the fact that many of the authors' main conclusions about Quebec could describe the situation in any province and region of the country.

Indeed, the situation in Quebec is in keeping with current standards across Canada: Holocaust and genocide education is not mandated by any provincial education authority. While it's often a suggested topic in the curriculum, it's left to local decision-makers and, ultimately, to individual teachers to grapple with how to teach the topic.

Many teachers do include the Holocaust in their curricula and do an excellent job, addressing the subject not only in history classes but integrating it into other subject areas. There are several examples of good elective courses on the Holocaust and genocide at upper secondary school levels. And even when textbook offerings are meagre, suggested secondary resources can be extensive.

But the gaps are wide: it is possible to finish a secondary school diploma in this country with only superficial exposure to the Holocaust. Working within the structural and cultural complexities of Canada's diverse education systems – which means that legally mandated Holocaust education is highly unlikely – doesn't mean we must accept low or no standards of training for the educators who are on the front lines of teaching the Holocaust. And it doesn't mean the best possible resources should not be made widely available.

The best way to tackle this issue is to focus on teacher training and the provision of educational resources – teach the teachers and give them good materials. All accredited teacher training programs in Canada, for example, should be required to include methods and pedagogy on teaching the Holocaust and genocide.

Moreover, every school board should survey the local resources available to teachers and encourage their use. Holocaust centres across Canada offer materials and guidance and undertake educational outreach throughout their provinces. Excellent resources and support are also available from a number of non-profit organizations throughout the country – the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Asper Foundation and Facing History and Ourselves come to mind.

Among the best resources are the powerful, personal, first-hand accounts that allow readers to grasp the enormity of what happened in the Holocaust, one story at a time. The Azrieli Foundation, through the Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program, makes such resources available free of charge to educators and schools across the country. The personal connection that is created between a reader and the survivor is often the catalyst for students who might not otherwise be inclined to delve deeper into the history of the Holocaust and related themes.

We stand today on a bridge between memory and history. Very soon, there will be no first-person witnesses to the Shoah left. As we learn from Pirkei Avot (The Ethics of Our Fathers): "You are not required to complete the task, yet you are not free to withdraw from it." We challenge Canadian teachers and educational authorities to plug the curriculum gaps, provide in-depth learning about the Holocaust, and ensure that this genocide, which was unprecedented in history and set the precedent for all genocides to come, is taught to our children – our future leaders. ■

The politics of kashrut

CJN Investigation: First of a three-part series

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Part way through an interview, Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon becomes particularly animated. He's been talking about his interpretation of Jewish law as it pertains to insects that can be found in vegetables and fruits, but when the discussion turns to his reputation he becomes angry.

A letter had been put up at a mid-town Toronto yeshiva in 2011 questioning his ability to determine what is kosher and what is not. The letter, he said in a raised voice, embarrassed him in his role as kashrut administrator of the Badatz Toronto kosher certification agency, which he, along with Rabbi Amram Assayag of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, founded in 2008.

The document questioned Badatz's certification of lettuce that may contain bugs and suggested the produce should not be considered kosher enough for the retail trade.

"That embarrassed me, as I'm the head mashgiach [kashrut supervisor]," said Rabbi Bensalmon. "My reputation is at stake."

The incident is one of several since Badatz began to challenge the market domination over kashrut supervision in Toronto that has been held for years by the Kashruth Council of Canada, which administers the COR hechsher and is also known by that name.

Several suppliers and caterers contacted by The CJN had their own complaints about COR. Among them were allegations that its rules appeared arbitrary and are subject to inexplicable change, costs are uncertain, as if subject to whim, and that COR's practices have led to unnecessarily high fees.

There are also concerns that COR's practices have limited the availability of Badatz-supervised products to the kosher market.

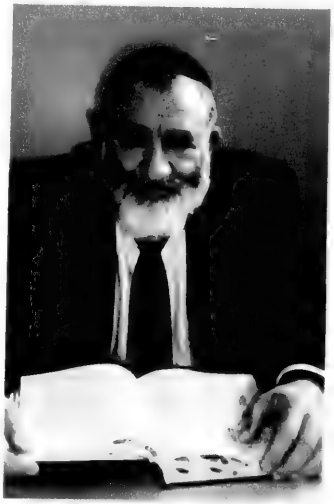
To date, Badatz has attracted around 25 clients. Rabbi Bensalmon believes it could be more but for questions being asked about the company's kashrut credentials. More egregious, he said, is that COR has let its clients know that if they switch to Badatz, their products won't be permitted in COR-sanctioned premises.

"We did lose many clients, caterers, manufacturers," he said.

For more than 20 years, Rabbi Bensalmon worked for COR, supervising the kosher food operations at Sobeys Clark Avenue supermarket for much of that time. His departure from COR did not end amicably. Issues pertaining to his termination ended up in arbitration before a rabbinical court, or beit din. The court's 2008 decision called on COR to pay Rabbi Bensalmon $100,000, including $10,000 for injury to reputation. The beit din also called on COR to provide a favourable letter of reference – which Rabbi Bensalmon says he never received – and on the parties to "obligate themselves not to disparage or speak negatively regarding the other."

While Badatz is a relative newcomer to the kosher certification scene, COR has been around for more than 60 years.

It started life as the Kashruth Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, but after rapid growth, "which made the job of effective management by Congress difficult... it was decided that COR should become its own legal entity," COR stated in an ad that is running in today's paper. It was incorporated as a non-profit entity in July 2000 and began to operate independently in 2004.



Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon

Critics say COR charges too much for its services. Caterers and manufacturers who have moved to Badatz say the rival agency's fees are lower and the supervision just as extensive as under COR.

One company, Hubberts, which produces cooking oil, ended a longstanding contract with COR when it forecast its annual bill would reach $45,000. Instead, it found alternative supervision under Triangle-K, an American kashrut agency, and Badatz for about half that price. Prior to Hubberts' decision to let its contract with COR lapse, it was involved in several disputes with the agency over practices at its Brampton plant that COR felt jeopardized the kashrut of its product and that required a full review. COR suggested several changes to Hubberts' practices and proposed raising its supervision fees from $67 a visit to $90.

Craig Simpkins, systems manager at Hubberts felt the disagreements with COR were a pretext for raising the fees.

Raphy Amar and his wife, Joelle Edery, operate Beverly Hills Catering. From 2004 to 2008, they ran Gladstone's, a kosher restaurant. That business folded because of high operating costs, including a $2,000 monthly fee to COR, said Amar.

According to Morley Rand, a former COR mashgiach who has been involved in litigation with his ex-employer on several fronts, COR faced competition last year for its kashrut supervision at Sobeys store in Thornhill. The Montreal Vaad Ha'ir, which administers the MK hechsher, offered to do the job for $100,000, about half of COR's annual fee. COR dropped its fee by $60,000 to retain the contract, Rand said.

MK would not comment on the amount of its bid. Sobeys did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

COR refused to answer questions posed to it by The CJN. In an emailed statement, the kashrut agency wrote, "COR is not afraid of competition and indeed, we work closely with all of the major kosher certifiers."

Zuchter Berk, one of the city's biggest kosher caterers and a longstanding client of COR, has had a positive relationship with the kashrut agency.

"The relationship with COR is the same as we have with the health department," says Zuchter Berk's co-owner, Isaac Drookman. "At the end of the day, you have rules and regulations, and you have to follow the rules and regulations."

COR, he added, "is flexible, there's always give and take. I think they proved to me that they showed flexibility in many areas. There's give and take and [the relationship with COR] is collegial."

Edmund Duarte, founder of Uptown Gourmet, which has had the catering contract at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for 5-1/2 years, says COR initially refused to grant him kosher certification because he is not Jewish, but said he could overcome that by taking in a 25 per cent partner who is Jewish.

After 18 months with his partner, Duarte bought out him out. "It cost me [a lot of money] to get back what belonged to me," he said. "It appears the religion is very elastic and the rules change."

A few years ago, Applause Catering, was approached by Beth Tzedec Congregation to bid on its catering contract. With Badatz providing its hechscher, Applause won the contract in 2011. When COR found out, it sent an email to board members of COR. The email, sent by Rabbi Tuvia Basser, CEO of COR, on Sept. 14, 2011, noted that the Beth Tzedec had solicited bids for its catering service, including from a "high-end treif caterer who also operates a rarely used kosher division under Badatz Toronto, who gives certification even to caterers who run treif catering as well."

Later that day, Badatz responded with an email of its own. Addressed to COR board members, Badatz alleged the earlier COR email was meant "to protect COR's financial interests at Beth Tzedec" and "misrepresent[ed] the facts."

The Badatz letter noted that Applause Catering is not a treif business, that one of its partners is shomer Shabbat, and that "Badatz only certified premises that are completely separate where only a kitchen under lock is operated with a full-time mashgiach." The Badatz letter also pointed out that two COR-certified establishments prepare both kosher and non-kosher foods and operate on Shabbat and Passover.

Beth Tzedec also responded angrily to the COR email.

In a letter dated Sept. 27, 2011, sent to Rabbi Yacov Felder, vice-chair of COR and to Rabbi Basser, Carolyn Kolers, president of the synagogue, called the suggestion that the shul was considering hiring a "treif caterer... untrue and defamatory." She asked that COR send a retraction notice to all recipients of the previous email.

On Oct. 6, 2011, Rabbi Basser wrote COR board members saying his "lack of precision in the wording of that email... led to a misunderstanding of his position."

As a "clarification," Rabbi Basser wrote that "Beth Tzedec Congregation has always provided, and intends to continue providing, a high standard of kashrut and would only hire a caterer that upholds those values. I retract any implication otherwise."

Only a few months before the Beth Tzedec incident, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had looked into its kashrut policy and agreed to sanction events supervised by Badatz Toronto.

In a May 19, 2011, letter to Badatz representative Moti Bensalmon, UJA Federation stated that the organization's executive committee "voted to approve using venues and caterers under Badatz Toronto supervision. We have confidence in the high level of kashrut supervision provided by your agency and look forward to working with Badatz approved caterers and venues."

Despite the approval of an important community agency, Badatz has found it difficult to attract clients.

"Once COR heard we were getting into the catering business, they spoke to those people to persuade them not to go with us," said Rabbi Bensalmon.

"They claim sovereignty on an entire city that belongs to them, and nobody else is allowed to open up another kosher organization," he said. ■

To what extent does COR's dominant market position in kashrut certification affect the prices paid by consumers? Next week The CJN looks at this issue and whether, as a $5-million charitable organization, COR is giving enough back to the community.

OPINION

It's not enough to remember and feel bad

Avrum Rosensweig

Yom Hashoah is when we remember the Holocaust and the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis.

Around the world, events are held to help us understand the atrocities, which included the brutal murder of 1.5 million of our children. Survivors remind us of the death marches, Jewish sex slaves and the medical torture of Josef Mengele.

Technology has enhanced our ability to remember the lives and deaths of one-third of our people, two million Roma, homosexuals and the disabled. On Yom Hashoah, you can watch March of the Living events on your phone from the comfort of your home. You can listen to former Israeli chief rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, a survivor of Buchenwald, lead memorial services in Poland, along with the sweet voices of Israeli singers and orators.

Millions have been spent on such events. This year 10,000 young people flew to Poland for the March of the Living and joined in "death marches" and prayers at Auschwitz, draped in Israeli flags and singing loudly. The esthetics are breath-taking. The idea that we're reclaiming our history in Europe through spirited horahs in the streets of Poland is encouraging.

Holocaust education is alive and attracts participants and donors at every turn. Books, theatre and buildings continue to be underwritten, so that we can remember. Kol hakavod!

However, here is a most disturbing fact: Holocaust education is predicated almost entirely on one thing, and that's remembrance, not action.

Let's look at the March of the Living as a case in point. Since it was launched in 1988, more than 150,000 teens from around the world have made the trek to Poland and Israel to, according to its website, "study the history of the Holocaust and to examine the roots of prejudice, intolerance and hate."

There's absolutely no requirement that alumna do anything but learn about what happened to our people (and so many others). There's no obligation to commit time and sweat to remedy the injustices and inequities happening today, both in the Jewish and non-Jewish worlds. This is very troublesome.

A couple of years ago, two philanthropists decided there was something terribly wrong with this scenario – that young people would return from such a powerful and sometimes traumatic trip with angst in their soul and yet not have to, for instance, help impoverished Jews in Ukraine or Iran, fight on behalf of underfunded survivors living in Israel today, advocate on behalf of Jewish and non-Jewish shut-ins in Vaughan, Ont., or downtown Toronto, or help ensure the safety of Roma in Hungary and the rest of Europe.

The two set about implementing a plan whereby March alumna would tap into various tikkun olam programs and initiatives. The plan failed. Among the reasons were a lack of Jewish federation support and the belief among March leaders that we cannot demand that our youth become involved in follow-up activism.

The outcome, as Hillel professionals will tell you, is that March of the Living (and Birthright Israel) participants don't flock to programs on campus to counter anti-Israel/Jewish programs. Ask Jewish volunteer organizations if they're having problems attracting young people to counter the very serious challenges we're living with today, including the rise of anti-Semitism, and they'll answer "yes."

So what of Holocaust education? What exactly are the lessons we're trying to teach? Is remembering enough?

As we move forward, I call upon all Holocaust education organizations to establish sound and authentic follow-up programming, including leadership development and on-the-ground activism.

Similarly, I ask that a philanthropist reading this step up and pledge funds specifically for the purpose of getting our young people to become directly involved in issues affecting the Jewish world, the impoverished and the "stranger."

It's not enough to remember. It's not enough to know why. It's not enough to feel bad. We must act, for if we do not, those who perpetrate evil will leave goodness far behind. ■

Quebec teaches us a valuable lesson in civility

Bernie Farber

Last month, we learned a valuable lesson about public discourse. And it came from, of all places, Quebec.

Former premier Pauline Marois should have won the provincial election handily. She believed that by playing the intolerance and bully cards, Quebecers would finally hand her the majority she craved.

The Parti Québécois' proposed "charter of values" – I called it the charter of intolerance – that made certain faith groups second-class citizens was her touchstone. Targeting those who wear kippahs, niqabs and turbans, Marois believed she had found the secret ingredient that would bind most Québécois together. She was wrong. Yet intolerance, bullying and libel are still very much with us.

A recent editorial in this newspaper outlined the parameters of acceptable behaviour. Kol hakavod to editor Yoni Goldstein for articulating a modern worldview utilizing the ancient Jewish concept of lashon hara (the sin of the evil tongue).

According to Jewish law, any statement – written or verbal – that leads to hurt or humiliation or damages the well-being of another is lashon hara. More serious is the sin of defamation, or motzi shem ra. Judaism strongly recognizes the importance of one's character and the danger of gossip and slander. And perhaps much to the chagrin of those who claim to hold the truth as a defence, in Judaism, no such defense exists. In Jewish law, the only deciding factor is whether the statement causes harm.

Thus you would think that Jews more than most would know better. Sadly, too many who publish bigoted political blogs that utilize bullying words and the worst forms of both lashon hara and motzi shem ra come from our own community

In the past, it was difficult for bullies to gain a public pulpit. Letters to newspapers were closely monitored to ensure that slander and intimidation were not published. Likewise for magazines and TV. Professional mainstream media, for the most part, undertook the responsibility to self-regulate. Today, anyone can publish anything and distribute it through blogs, Twitter and Facebook to potentially thousands in the blink of an eye.

Whether from the hard right, where many of these blogs originate, or the far left, which also engages in personal attacks, it's time we return civility to public discourse.

Make no mistake: I'm not advocating that uncivil behaviour be regulated. I suppose people have a right to be rude, ignorant and ill-mannered. And for the most egregious of hate speech, Canada already has some very robust anti-hate laws. My point is to make a case for what Canadians do best: engage in vigorous, passionate civil debate.

Our tradition is rich with stories that tell us of the importance of guarding our tongues. We're told the tongue is so powerful that it requires two gates (the lips and teeth) to restrain it.

Marois aptly demonstrated over the course of the election campaign what happens when both the lips and teeth fail to do their job. And while the PQ remains a political party to be reckoned with, Quebecers thankfully did not let her tilt toward intolerance and bullying and instead chose respectful engagement.

My dear friend and former Canadian Jewish Congress colleague Eric Vernon got it right when he wrote of John F. Kennedy's 1961 inaugural address admonishing both sides of the Cold War divide that "civility is not a weakness."

More than 50 years later, Vernon expanded on Kennedy's admonition quite wisely, noting that "civility is an essential component of a healthy, vibrant democracy that encourages civic engagement and the frank discussion of opposing perspectives in the public square."

When it comes to public discourse, let's not settle for mediocrity. Let's work toward true civility. In that regard, I'm always reminded of the words of my late mentor, Louis Lenkinski, a Holocaust survivor, tough trade unionist and former chair of CJC's community relations committee, who advised: "Never engage in a pissing match with a skunk. Just let the skunks pee amongst themselves." ■

Reform Jews must look at themselves

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Reform and Conservative Jews feel discriminated against in Israel. The rabbinic establishment shuns them. Though the state pays salaries to some non-Orthodox rabbis, it ignores and discriminates against them in many other ways.

Polls indicate many secular Israelis favour equal rights for all religious streams, yet most non-observant Jews choose Orthodox synagogues and rabbis for life-cycle events. Of those who turn to Conservative and Reform congregations, only a few actually join them, and even fewer are actively involved.

Nevertheless, non-Orthodox Jewish movements remain committed to Israel. They show it, for example, by insisting that their rabbinical students spend at least a year there. If some return less than enthusiastic about the state, it may be due to a sense of not really being wanted.

I perceived some of that when I heard a Shabbat sermon last month at the Jerusalem campus of Hebrew Union College, which trains Reform Jewish professionals. The weekly portion was Metzora, which deals with an affliction called tzara'at, often erroneously rendered as leprosy but is better identified as "a mysterious and causeless malady that renders you utterly incapable of partaking in society."

That's how it was described by the speaker, Sam Kaye is completing a year in Israel before returning to the United States for the rest of his five-year rabbinical training. Referring to the ritual unfitness that may cause the affliction and deem sufferers to be outside the camp yet still inside the Israelite community, he suggested that's how many Israelis perceive Reform Jews.

I believe he reflects the feelings of most of his fellow students: "All too often, especially in this city, it feels as if Reform Jews are the modern lepers of the traditional Jewish world, described as unfit and unqualified to participate in matters related to spirituality. While we remain in the secular realm, we're tacitly accepted… but when we desire to enter into the realm of that which is holy, suddenly our infection bubbles to the surface."

He believes the reason is that "Reform Judaism lifts up a mirror to Jewish society and reminds it of an uncomfortable truth" about the Orthodox establishment. He argued that "those that society has traditionally deemed 'spiritually unfit' are actually quite capable of embodying spirituality."

Kaye seems to have had in mind the "big tent" that Conservative and Reform Judaism advocate. They and other liberal groups seek to make room for as many Jews as possible, irrespective of halachic status and chosen lifestyle.

He urged perseverance in the face of establishment intransigence: "Even if authorities don't believe in our message or when they invalidate the messenger, it doesn't change the need to continue holding up the mirror and show our people the flaws, the cracks, and the impurities they would rather pretend did not exist."

Escape into victimhood is common among those who feel discriminated against. Self-righteousness to the point of claiming higher moral sensitivity than others is part of the defence mechanism.

But Kaye went further. He urged the future Reform rabbis, cantors and educators whom he was addressing to apply the same scrutiny to themselves as they do to others. Our critics, he said, are also holding up a mirror "that is shedding light on our failure to maintain Jewish identity" and they're sending us a message "eerily similar to our own: 'turn inward; acknowledge where you have left others behind.'" Instead of self-pity and self-righteousness, he advocated self-scrutiny.

Hence his sober conclusion: "When we demand that others face their reflection, it is fundamental that we do not find ourselves unable to bear that same self-scrutiny when our own turn arrives." Being victims doesn't entitle us to be smug. Responding to our critics includes being steadfast in our commitment, yet learning from them, despite their belligerence.

I can think of no more apt way to articulate my own Judaism: stand my ground as a critic, but apply the same rigid standards to myself. I'm grateful for the reminder. ■

Citizenship revocations as national security tool

Danny Eisen and Sheryl Saperia

Bill C-24, the Strengthening Canadian Citizenship Act, has headed to a parliamentary committee for further study. From a national security perspective, the bill's most interesting provisions are those allowing the government to revoke the citizenship of Canadians convicted of terrorism or treason, or who engage in armed conflict with Canada.

These crimes fall under a narrow category of egregious misbehaviour. Treason and armed conflict are actions perpetrated against Canada as a national entity and political community. The same can be said for terrorism, particularly when committed in Canada, against a Canadian target, or in association with a terrorist group banned by the Canadian government (in effect a public enemy of Canada). It's therefore fitting that one consequence of these crimes may be loss of citizenship to the country the offender either seeks to harm or utilizes to inflict damage abroad.

To be sure, a measure as severe as revocation of citizenship must be drafted to ensure conformity to Canadian laws and international obligations.

In accordance with the UN Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness, the bill provides that if a person holds only Canadian citizenship, it's not possible for that citizenship to be revoked – regardless of the offence – because no person can be stateless.

However, this has opened up the argument that the bill unfairly creates two classes of citizens: those with dual or multiple citizenship who are at risk of having their Canadian citizenship revoked, and those with only Canadian citizenship who may be punished in a variety of ways but cannot lose their citizenship.

For dual nationals who have chosen that status – often because of personal connection to, or benefit from, more than one citizenship – this is not a compelling argument. Dual citizenship was not forced upon them, and they can choose to renounce their other citizenship so as to be solely Canadian and, therefore, not subject to these provisions.

But what about foreign states that do not permit renunciation of citizenship? Would this subject an individual from such a country to unfair treatment under the bill?

Fortunately, citizenship revocation is not automatic and decisions are to be made on a case-by-case basis. Our recommendation in these cases, more specifically, is to have the immigration minister assess the extent of the person's "active relationship" to the other citizenship. Does the person maintain deep ties to the other country? Has he invoked any rights of that citizenship? Has he travelled with the passport of that country or served in an official capacity only open to citizens? The more active the citizenship, the weaker would be any claim that his other citizenship was forced on him and that he would renounce it if the option were available.

While citizenship revocation is an important tool to deal with those convicted of the most serious crimes against Canada, preventative and disruptive action must also be part of the package. Counter-radicalization programs are essential.

Strengthening exit controls for both sole and dual citizens is another option. Ray Boisvert, a former assistant director of intelligence at CSIS, once suggested that "there has to be an easy way to trigger a denial of a passport – or the removal of somebody's passport – if there is sufficient information to demonstrate this person has become highly radicalized and or made threats, or done things to threaten lives or the welfare and well being of others." The RCMP's recently disclosed High Risk Traveller Case Management system, which is intended to "prevent radicalized youth from leaving for conflict zones like Syria, Somalia and North Africa," seems to employ just such a mechanism, among others.

Western security agencies are concerned that their citizens are travelling to Syria and other theatres of jihad, gaining the skills to pursue similar acts in their home countries. If the citizenship revocation provisions in C-24 help prevent bloodshed from being exported to or from Canada, they are worth parliamentary consideration. Let's remember that it took only 19 hijackers to perpetrate the 9/11 attacks. ■

Ukrainian Jewish leader says Russia a threat

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Ukrainian-Jewish community leader Josef Zissels was in Toronto last week to urge Canadian Jews not to fall for Russian propaganda that paints Ukraine as a fascist, anti-Semitic country and implored them to lobby the Canadian government to impose aggressive economic sanctions against Russia or risk paying a "very high price" later.

During a visit to The CJN office, Zissels, the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress' chairman, explained that a little more than two months ago, 40,000 Russian troops invaded the Crimean peninsula.

"They came, based on their propaganda, to save the Russian [-speaking] population [and to protect Jews] from the fascists. And for two months, 40,000 Russian soldiers have been looking for fascists and they have not been able to find one," he said, tongue placed firmly in cheek.

Speaking through a translator, Zissels, who was invited by the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter – a non-profit cultural group that promotes stronger ties between Ukrainians and Jews – to talk about what is really happening in Ukraine, said Jews in the west have so easily accepted the Russian propaganda because of Ukraine's "dark" history with anti-Semitism.

"But Ukraine has changed significantly. The changes happened not only since the Soviet Union broke up, but the changes began in the '50s and '60s," Zissels said, adding that it's hard for people who have not lived in Ukraine for the past 30 or 40 years to understand that.

"When Russian propaganda says that there are fascists in Ukraine, it's hard for those who are not able to check the facts not to believe the propaganda."

Zissels went so far as to "guarantee" the new Ukraine is safe for Jews.

"I'm not saying [anti-Semitism] doesn't exist. It always exists," he said. "But we see in the new Ukrainian government that they battle against xenophobia and anti-Semitism… But if they at some point move away from this direction, we will be the first to criticize them."

Zissels, who was once jailed for six years in Russia as a political prisoner, spoke about the skepticism he faced when he was the first Jewish leader to endorse the Maidan movement, the anti-Russian protest that succeeded in toppling the government of former Ukrainian president Viktor Yankovych.

Many Jews who opposed the Maidan movement were wary of the support it received from a party called Svoboda, which used to hold anti-Semitic views.

"In Svoboda, some of the leaders did make anti-Semitic statements in the '90s, but they were a marginal group at the time… In recent years, they've completely moved away from anti-Semitic propaganda, and because of that, they won places in Parliament, because people stopped being afraid of them," Zissels said.

He added there are people in the party who are anti-Semitic and have posted disparaging content on their personal blogs, but they're in the minority and don't represent the party's official views.

Zissels also downplayed the significance of leaflets distributed in Donetsk urging Jews to register or risk deportation, saying that it was nothing more than a "provocation."

"Even the Donetsk Jews aren't panicking over the flyers, because they understand that it is a provocation, and these flyers didn't add much to the anxiety, because there is already anxiety because of the militarized situation."

Rather than focus on the perceived threat of anti-Semitism in Ukraine, the international community should focus attention on Russia's obsession with "renewal of the empire," Zissels said, adding that it's imperative to "find a mechanism to stop this aggression. If we don't stop this in time, then we will have to pay a very high price for this like this we did in the 1940s. In 1935, it was easier to stop, but to stop in 1945, we had to kill 50, 60 million people."

He said stronger economic sanctions need to be put in place against Russia, which is already struggling economically.

He emphasized the importance of western governments putting pressure on Russia, but said Canada "has done actually quite a lot, because I think Canada understands the situation better than the United States." ■

Ve'ahavta poses the question:

Can you live below the poverty line?

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Close to 10 per cent of Canadian households live below the international extreme poverty line of $1.75 a day, according to some Children's Aid Society statistics.

For five days, staff from Ve'ahavta, the humanitarian and relief organization, took up the challenge of trying to eat and drink on that dollar amount, taking part in Live Below the Line, a global movement that raises money to combat extreme poverty.

Participants in the challenge experience the struggle that more than 1.2 billion people face every day.

"When you actually put yourself in an environment where you, on some level, have to feel that level of hunger, it becomes more real," says Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta president and CEO and CJN columnist.

For the challenge, Ve'ahavta's staff participants pooled their money together and strategized how to make the most of their budget. Mornings consisted of half a cup of oatmeal and half a banana, while lunches were lentil potato stew. Cheap fruit and eggs were also available at the office to help those craving a snack.

"You become so conscious of how you're rationing," said Robyn Segall, director of communications and operations, when The CJN interviewed her on the first day of the challenge. "I'm already so hungry and cranky. People have foregone their morning coffee."

Rosensweig said that even though he has shifted his diet to more fruits and vegetables because his son is vegan, Live Below the Line is still challenging.

"It's not easy," he said. "You're also thinking about what people who are truly impoverished go through. Emotionally, that's a challenge as well."

The committee raised $14,000 over the April 28 to May 2 period for three initiatives, with the goal of alleviating poverty, locally and around the world. People can still register and take the five-day challenge until June 30. The target goal is to raise $50,000 for these three programs. The organization has an anonymous donor who will match the grand total.

One of the recipients of the funds is the Ve'ahavta Street Academy (VSA), an eight-week education course for homeless and at-risk Torontonians that prepares them to go back to school and get off the street.

Classes empower these people by teaching them how to take the first steps on the road to a post-secondary education, as well as how to take on volunteer and leadership positions. Two of the original VSA participants will graduate with diplomas this June, Segall said.

The funds raised also went to Br'iut, a new program launched in Northern Ontario to assist with health initiatives on underserved First Nations reserves. The organization places graduate-level social work or public health students in these communities.

The last recipient was Muso, an international organization focused on eradicating disease in vulnerable areas around the world.

Live Below the Line began in Melbourne, Australia, in 2010 and has since spread to four other countries. The Global Poverty Project runs the campaign, as part of the company's focus on equipping people with the power to combat extreme poverty.

"It's one thing to live on $1.75 a day for an individual, but if you pool it together with as many people [as possible], it becomes a bit more manageable," said Danny Richmond, director of youth leadership for Ve'ahavta.

Richmond brought the idea of doing the Live Below the Line challenge to the organization this year. More than 20,000 people worldwide, from Australia to North America, also participated in the challenge last week.

Rosensweig said Live Below the Line reminds him of Passover, when he reads in the Haggadah that people should really feel as if they were among the Israelites coming out of Egypt.

"I think what [the Haggadah is] saying is to metaphorically superimpose what the Jews of Egypt went through over today's experience," he said. "Understand what the trials and tribulations are of families here in Toronto... who perhaps have one meal a day, maybe two. There should not be a child in the world who has to go through hunger."■

Ontario to open Israel office to promote economic ties

plungen@thecjn.ca

The rain is falling, flowers are budding and if you breath deeply, you can make out more than just a faint whiff of an election in the air.

Coincidental with the season, the government of Ontario last week announced it was opening an office in Israel to help promote business and trade between the two jurisdictions.

The government will soon solicit applications for an official to run the office, someone with his or her finger on the business pulse of both Ontario and Israel, to better bring together potential partners for joint ventures or investments.

The office will likely open in the summer, said Eric Hoskins, minister of economic development, trade and employment. When it does, likely in proximity to the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv, it will mark only the second Ontario representative office abroad during his ministry, joining one inaugurated in Sao Paulo, Brazil in 2014. Other Ontario offices are located in New York, San Francisco, Mexico City, London, Paris, Munich, Beijing, Shanghai, Tokyo, and New Delhi.

"This should be a strong signal of the priority the government gives to this relationship," Hoskins said.

The government of Ontario created the ministry headed by Hoskins in 2013, with the mandate of "Going Global" when it comes to trade and growth.

"Increasing the number of Ontario companies that export and help companies expand their trade to new markets is fundamental to growth," the ministry stated.

Ontario and Israel did around $800 million in two-way trade in 2013, but, "I believe nothing can replace the ground focus to build and foster those ties, said Hoskins.

"Ontario and Israel have a long history of working closely together," the minister stated. There is opportunity for co-operation in the high-tech, energy and water sectors.

"Israel is an economically thriving nation with many strong connections to our province. An on-the-ground presence in Israel will forge new partnerships between businesses, and help Ontario companies grow and create jobs here at home."

Last week, Hoskins hosted a roundtable at the Ontario Investment and Trade Centre. Close to 30 business and community leaders gathered to brainstorm ideas to help the project succeed.

"We brought the cream of the crop around the table to guide us through this process going forward," said Hoskins, who has visited Israel four times, including twice as head of a trade delegation.

"Israel is a natural priority," he stated. Pointing to the significant Jewish population in the province, Hoskins said, "We have a great relationship between Israel and Ontario...so the business and other ties between Ontario and Israel are strong."

Israeli Consul General DJ Schneeweiss said Israel would co-operate to ensure the project succeeds, bringing benefits to both Israel and Ontario. "This is a reflection of our strength but also a reflection of the Ontario leadership to identify the opportunities," he said.

Joel Reitman, founder and president of Jillcy Investments, said "I'm a proud Jewish Ontarian who loves Israel.

"It's fantastic what's being done in Israel," said Reitman, whose company has invested in Israel's high-tech sector. "We're looking for investments all the time. Israel is certainly a wonderful place to invest in.

"Ontario is a treasure trove of very brilliant people too."

Barry Sherman, chair and CEO of Apotex, a pharmaceutical company, said the success of a representative office in Israel will be judged on the extent it helps make things happen.

"Apotex is eager to find any collaboration that makes sense," he said.

The company currently does not do business in Israel, largely because the industry is dominated by a big Israeli player.

But there's a lot of potential for business in Israel, he said. A trade officer "could be helpful as long as he works hard and sees the opportunities to synergies."

"We need someone to identify the opportunities and bring them to us."

Canada and Israel signed a Free Trade Agreement in 1996, and in 2005, Ontario and Israel signed a Memorandum of Understanding to promote industrial research and development. To date, 14 industry-led joint R&D ventures have been approved in the areas of medical devices, information and communication technology, manufacturing, clean tech and life sciences. ■

'Panov program' to study individualized cancer treatment

Part of a $3.8-million, three-pronged sarcoma research project at Mount Sinai

PAUL LUNGEN

Four years ago, Yaron Panov's oncologist gave him what could be considered a death sentence. Panov was suffering from sarcoma, a particularly aggressive form of cancer, and doctors in Toronto had no solution. Their advice: go home and get your affairs in order.

Not content with that suggestion, Panov and his wife, physician Rochelle Schwartz, searched for options available in other jurisdictions. They found one developed by an American-Israeli company, Champions Oncology, which has proven effective and kept Panov alive longer than the months he had been given to live.

Now they want other Canadians to benefit from the same innovative technology that has helped Panov.

On May 4, a fundraiser was held to launch the Panov Program in Precision Chemotherapy, a co-operative venture of Mount Sinai Hospital and Champions Oncology.

It's one part of a $3.8-million, three-pronged sarcoma research project at Mount Sinai, said Kevin Goldthorp, president of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation. The others will study the effectiveness of drugs on treating the disease and its genetic component. Contributors can designate that their donation goes only to the Panov program.

Panov and Schwartz say their goal is to raise $1.5 million over the next six months to fund three to five years of research into the efficacy of the treatment promoted by Champions. If successful, the results could prove persuasive when it comes to convincing OHIP to fund the technology, which can cost $15,000 to $20,000 for three to five chemotherapy trials.

That's down from the $40,000 it cost Panov and Schwartz four years ago.

Schwartz said the approach developed by Champions, and employed in England, Singapore and Israel, has proven more successful than traditional chemotherapy.

Tissue samples are taken from the patient and implanted in immune-deficient lab mice. The cancers are allowed to grow, and then the mice are treated with various chemicals to determine which drug works best.

Once that pharmaceutical is found, it can be used on the human patient, with 90 per cent assurance that if it worked in the mice, it will work in the person.

In addition to proving remarkably effective, it saves the patient the experience of undergoing the hit-and-miss, trial-and-error process that is currently employed. The cocktail of chemotherapy drugs may or may not work, but they often leave the patient feeling terrible, Schwartz said.

There is a tremendous need for new approaches to treat sarcoma. Fifteen per cent of all cancers in children are sarcomas, and it's the cancer that took Terry Fox's life, Schwartz added.

A recent study published in the journal Cancer showed there was a high degree of correlation between the results in the mice and in human patients.

The findings were published online in a study titled Patient-derived xenografts for individualized care in advanced sarcoma. Commenting on the findings, David Sidransky, director of head and neck cancer research at Johns Hopkins University and chair of Champions Oncology said, "It has been a long-time goal of the oncology community to develop therapeutics and treatment protocols that can be tailored to individual patients for the best outcomes. These data support the promise of using TumorGrafts to accurately predict drug response in clinical settings."

Sidransky was guest speaker at the weekend fundraiser.

Schwartz said a meeting about a year ago with physicians from Mount Sinai led to the current pilot project. Once funded, the program will see 50 sarcoma patients in Toronto undergo the same procedure that helped Panov. Because of the cancer's aggressive nature, he continues to take drugs to keep it under control.

Sharla Lichtman, Schwartz's medical partner at the Genesis Professional Group and Panov's physician, said the "shidduch" between Champions and Mount Sinai is "a win-win proposition."

"Nobody's making money here," added Schwartz. "We're making history."

As for Panov, he is hopeful others can benefit from the treatment developed by Champions.

"As a patient, I don't need to go through the trial and error and be told after three or four months, 'Sorry, it doesn't work.'

"When I go to this chemo, I know it's working. There's a reassurance that it worked in the mice, it will work on me.

"It gives such a boost to your morale and you feel better about yourself, that it can succeed since it was tested on a piece of my body.

"That's huge in healing," he said. "It's better for you mentally and physically." ■

Empowering students through kindness

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Kindness Week, a program designed to empower students through acts of kindness, will engage hundreds of Toronto-area students from kindergarten to Grade 12 in an effort to address issues of stress, anxiety and isolation, while building school spirit and stronger community ties.

Modya Silver, a 52-year-old father of five with a 25-year background in marketing and technology, is the founder of Kindness Week, which will run for the first time from May 5 to 9.

Silver said his desire to do tikkun olam work and to try to inspire others to be kinder to one another was an evolutionary process.

"Part of the evolution was that I got very interested and passionate about the school of Mussar," he said.

Mussar is a Jewish movement that focuses on character strength development, Silver explained.

"So I had a teacher for a number of years and we would work on a particular trait for at least a year and a half and when we got to the trait of kindness, of chessed, then it really spoke to me. There was this resonance, like, this was my trait, meaning that this was a trait that I needed to develop."

He said he was inspired to start a website called Kuppah, which lists about 30 Jewish and/or Israeli charities to which one can chose to donate.

"Because I have a technology background it all made sense for me to build this website... but I wanted to get my hands dirtier and help people," Silver said.

After running some local projects in the community, he decided to approach the Ontario Trillium Foundation for a grant.

He said their message to him was that he should think bigger.

"These projects that I was doing were beautiful, but they were only helping a limited number of people and it just seemed like I could do something even bigger than that and that is where Kindness Week came from," Silver said.

"This is really about empowering students to showcase who they really are," he said, adding that the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) partnered with him on the event, as did a number of schools in York Region, and Jewish day schools including Tiferes Bais Yaakov, Associated Hebrew School's Hurwich campus, and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"Kindness Week isn't about giving kids the opportunity to be kind, it's really giving them a platform to showcase the kindness they already have and celebrating that kindness."

Modya Silver, Kindness Week founder

Silver said this idea borrows from a relatively new psychological approach that focuses on nurturing positive traits rather than trying to eliminate negative ones.

"The school of positive psychology says... let's just start building on the positive traits like kindness, compassion and love and empathetic joy and all those things," Silver said.

"My thinking is that we have serious problems with students like bullying, stress, anxiety and depression and there are some wonderful organizations that deal with that. But maybe there is room for a new organization like mine to focus on building the positive traits for the kids who suffer from depression and anxiety and so on."

Although this program is only in its first year, it has already garnered attention from Toronto City Council. On May 6, Toronto city councillors Joe Mihevc and James Pasternak will proclaim the week as Kindness Week.

Silver and his Kindness Week participants were also invited to take part in TDSB's annual Social Justice Fair at York University on May 7, during which Kindness Week representatives will make a presentation to the head of the TDSB.

"A lot of the programming is going to be happening in the schools, like a school cleanup, or a whole class will write gratitude cards and then walk over to the local fire station or to their custodian or crossing guard, or whoever, and hand these gratitude cards to them," Silver said.

"I was just working with a school this morning that might go to a grocery store and help people bag or carry the bags out to the car and load them in the car."

Silver said that when some people learn about Kindness Week, they ask, 'and then what?'

"We're looking forward to a long-term relationship with the TDSB and in future years we want other school boards to be involved," he said.

"I'm looking to evolve this into a charity that would focus on proactive engagement of students, and character strength development."

GUEST VOICE

Film offers truer account of Jesus' death

JIMMY BITTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The film Son of God portrays the life and death of Jesus with such sensitivity that Anti-Defamation League national director Abraham Foxman stated that the film will be "the antidote to the poison that [Mel Gibson's film] The Passion of the Christ became." The latter was accused of fanning the flames of hatred by reviving the claim of deicide (killing God), while the former is being celebrated by many Jewish leaders for being the most earnest and gentle attempt to tell the story of the most important trial in human history in a way that's not bad for the Jews.

Gibson revived the old canard of Jewish guilt, in contradiction to historical truth and to the repudiation of the Catholic Church and most Protestant churches. Son of God is being warmly received by many Jewish leaders because it embraces historical truth rather than the biblical narrative, which uses literary devices to lay the blame for Jesus' death squarely on the Jews.

The historical truth accepted by most modern scholars of antiquity is that the biblical narrative found in the Gospels of Mark, Matthew and Luke calumniate the Jews by way of literary devices. The Gospels are polemically charged sources whose goal is the advancement of theology, not the accurate recording of history.

According to Mark's account, the high priest asks Jesus if he is "Christ the Son of the Blessed." For a Judean high priest to construct this question in the way purported by Mark is theologically peculiar, and thus unlikely, because it would suggest his recognition that the Messiah would be the son of God – an idea completely foreign to early Judean exegeses.

It seems plausible that the author has fabricated this as a literary technique to lay the blame for Jesus' death at the door of the Sanhedrin, whom intentionally overlook a truth they purportedly admit – that Jesus is the Christ. This condemnation of the Sanhedrin is, more importantly, a rhetorical ploy aimed at demonstrating that even the Judean legal and religious leadership believed that Jesus was the Messiah, but nevertheless, their wickedness overcame them, resulting in them handing over Jesus to Pontius Pilate.

The narrative of the trial of Jesus contains distinct differences compared to the one told by Mark. Matthew adds that the high priest and the council "sought false testimony" against Jesus, whereas Mark only writes that they "sought testimony." And to the question, "Are you Christ?" Mark's Jesus replies, "I am," which is in contrast with the author of Matthew, who changes the text to read, "You have said I am."

The addition of "false" in the book of Matthew is a rhetorical device intended to further attribute Jesus' death to the wickedness of Judean legal institutions. Interestingly, Matthew is silent on the timing of the trial (at night), and the sentencing to death of Jesus by the Sanhedrin. By overlooking these items found in Mark's narrative, Matthew by inference endorses them, thus affirming that the trial took place at night and that the Sanhedrin passed a death sentence.

In contrast to Mark and Matthew, who largely corroborate each other's account of the trial, Luke deviates from their narrative in several significant ways. For one, the weight of responsibility for Jesus' death is moved from the Romans to the Jews – possibly out of a politically motivated apologetic purpose, that is, to legitimize Christianity in the eyes of the Romans.

Differences that are more germane include: a) Luke situates the proceeding in the morning (not at night), perhaps to give the trial legal validity; and b) "And they led him away to their council" means, according to historians Steve Mason and Thomas Robinson, that "he moves the scene of the trial from the high priest's house to the Sanhedrin's council chamber."

Confusion between narrative and historical truth exists as a common hazard in the writing of history. In the case of Jesus' death, the results have been untold and unspeakable Jewish suffering for millennia. A new era in a Jewish-Christian relations has begun with the shifting of accountability from the Jews to the Romans. Son of God reinforces this historical fact, which can only be good for the Jews.

The film will be released on Blue-ray and DVD in June. ■

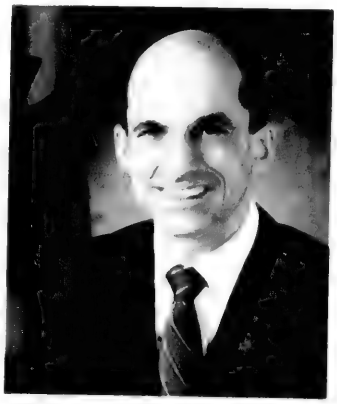
Relief organization named terrorist entity

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The now moribund website of the International Relief Fund for the Afflicted and Needy (IRFAN-Canada) claims it is "an international humanitarian... organization; dedicated to overcoming poverty and providing hope for the poor and the destitute worldwide."

But the reality is quite different, according to the government of Canada. On April 28, the federal Ministry of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness designated IRFAN-Canada a "terrorist entity." It joins a number of other similarly designated organizations, including Al Qaeda, the Taliban, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Hamas.



Steve Blaney

"It is now a criminal offence to knowingly deal in the property or finances of this entity," the ministry stated on its website.

The announcement coincided with RCMP raids on IRFAN's headquarters in Mississauga, Ont., and a residence in Montreal.

"An extensive amount of documentary evidence along with stored media, money and other records were seized," the RCMP stated.

According to Public Safety Minister Steve Blaney, IRFAN transferred $14.6 million "to various organizations associated with Hamas," between 2005 and 2009.

"The government of Canada is unwavering in its commitment to protect Canadians from the threat of terrorism. By listing IRFAN-Canada, we are sending the strong message that Canada will not tolerate terrorist activities including the financing of terrorist groups. IRFAN-Canada has knowingly financed Hamas, a listed terrorist entity, for many years. The well-intentioned and charitable Canadians who sought to support humanitarian relief through this organization deserve better," Blaney said.

The developments caught IRFAN and its lawyer by surprise. The organization had been preparing to go to Federal Court this month to challenge a 2011 ruling by the Canada Revenue Agency that revoked its charitable status.

"We're very concerned about the timing [of] this listing... which completely undermines any ability for this organization to work as a charity," IRFAN's Ottawa-based lawyer Yavar Hameed said.

Weizmann lauded for helping women pierce glass ceiling

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Naama Geva-Zatorsky, who was honoured April 29 by Weizmann Canada at its "Wonderful Women" event, said it's the support of the Weizmann Institute of Science that allows her to thrive as a female scientist in a field dominated by men.

Geva-Zatorsky, a Weizmann PhD and former post-doctoral fellow who is currently completing a post-doctoral fellowship at Harvard University, said she was honoured to be recognized by her alma mater, which she considers a "world-class institute."

"Every time I get recognized, it enriches my self-esteem and encourages me to continue. The route has quite a few challenges... It's a lot of hard work... you can survive it only if you're really passionate about it," Geva-Zatorsky said.

"At this stage, most of the Israeli women – because of the two- to three-year army service, or because of our culture, or both – we are usually married, or approaching marriage with perhaps a kid or a plan for a first child. At the end of my PhD, I had two kids, and moving abroad with a husband and kids is quite a challenge, so this is a kind of glass ceiling for women scientists," said the mother of three, who travelled to Toronto for the fundraiser with her two-month-old daughter.

She said in her field of biology, PhD candidates are usually split 50 per cent male and female. But at the post-doctoral level, the number of women drops dramatically.

> "I'm studying good bacteria, the symbiotic bacteria in our body.

She applauded Weizmann for creating the Women in Science award, which she received in 2011, because it "encourages women, lets them know they're good enough, that they're strong and encourages them to go further to the next step, the post-doc... It is difficult to be a woman scientist, but these enlightening initiatives really help to push us forward."

Geva-Zatorsky, 36, who was named Europe's top young researcher of the year in 2012 by the United Nations Education and Science Organization (UNESCO), talked about the elements of her research that are garnering attention in the scientific world.

"I'm studying good bacteria, the symbiotic bacteria in our body. Our body contains 10 times more bacteria cells than human cells, so we can think of ourselves more as bacteria than human," she said in an interview with The CJN.

"They are living within us in an intricate bond. We are eating our food, but cannot digest everything. They help us digest, and in turn, we provide them with an enriched environment for them to live in. It's an emerging field, and in the past few years, I joined a lab that studies these bacteria and their effects on our immune system."

She said her findings could also help treat diseases such as inflammatory bowel disease, colitis, irritable bowel syndrome and even multiple sclerosis.

Three other women were honoured alongside Geva-Zatorsky at the event, which welcomed more than 250 guests to Casa Loma.

Jennifer Weiner, the New York Times best-selling author of 10 novels, including In Her Shoes; Karen Kain, the National Ballet of Canada's artistic director; and Sherry Cooper, celebrity economist, sought-after speaker, writer and adviser, were each honoured for their success in their respective fields. ■

Community comes to rabbi's aid after pre-Pesach fire

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

When fire destroyed the home of Rabbi Chaim and Yocheved Boyarsky on April 2, 2014, leaving them and their five children homeless, one of their first concerns – once they knew everyone was safe – was for the students who would be counting on them for Passover meals.

The Boyarskys, co-directors of the Ottawa Chabad Student Network, were planning to host two seders for students who were unable to return home for the holidays, as well as to provide kosher-for-Pesach meals for them throughout the week. They had expected to do the cooking and host the students in their home, but this became impossible.

The Boyarsky family moved to a hotel, where they will remain until their home is rebuilt. According to Rabbi Boyarsky, the damage was estimated at $100,000. Fortunately, insurance will cover the repairs, but it will take some time before the home can be inhabited again.

Bram Bregman, vice-president of community building for the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, led the community effort to aid the Boyarskys so that they, in turn, could help the students.

"When we heard that a Jewish organization in Ottawa was in trouble, we took action. We helped them make alternate arrangements for their food preparation, and we set up a fund to help with any additional expenses they would be incurring to continue to offer their Pesach food and Pesach programs," said Bregman.

"The community raised over $5,000 for this effort."

Jenny Roberge, Ottawa's first and only female mashgiach, also came to their aid.

"We and the Boyarskys arrived in Ottawa at about the same time five years ago and have become very good friends. My husband found out about the fire on Facebook and told me. We were shocked. I stopped by the house on my way to work [at nearby Congregation Beth Shalom] and left a note for them to call me as soon as possible," she said.

It happened that none of the local synagogues was planning to kosher their kitchens for Passover, as no local caterers would be preparing food for the holidays, so the Boyarskys arranged to rent the kitchen at Congregation Beth Shalom.

Rabbi Levy Teitlebaum, head of the Ottawa Vaad Hakashruth, and Roberge, pitched in to help.

"It usually takes two weeks to prepare for Passover," said Roberge, "but we made that kitchen kosher for Pesach in two days!"

The Boyarskys and their team of helpers which included students and community volunteers – pulled off the amazing feat.

"We had a record number of students and volunteers, and we served about 800 meals throughout the week," said Rabbi Boyarsky.

They held two seders at Congregation Beth Shalom for 125 guests and served meals throughout the week at the University of Ottawa. No meals and no programs were cancelled.

"We are still running our programs, and we are looking forward to building bigger and better with God's help," Rabbi Boyarsky said. ■

The CRA revoked IRFAN's ability to issue tax receipts in 2011, saying, "CRA's findings indicated that IRFAN-Canada provided resources to operating partners that were run by officials of Hamas, openly supported and provided funding to Hamas, or have been listed by various jurisdictions because of their support for Hamas."

And last summer, IRFAN-Canada announced it was suspending operations, after CIBC said it would no longer provide it with banking services.

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), commended the government for designating IRFAN-Canada a banned terrorist organization.

> This move really should highlight for Canadians that terrorist groups are fundraising in Canada
> Noah Shack

"All Canadians should be alarmed that millions of dollars were raised in Canada to support a foreign terrorist group with a long record of suicide bombings and other attacks against civilians," he said.

"This decision has been long in the making, and we note the tireless efforts of former parliamentarian and current CIJA board member, Stockwell Day, who called attention to IRFAN-Canada's disturbing activities nearly a decade ago.

"This move really should highlight for Canadians that terrorist groups are fundraising in Canada. This does happen and hopefully the listing will send a clear message that Canadians won't tolerate the abuse of their charity," said Noah Shack, CIJA's deputy director of research.

Security expert David Harris said the terrorist designation "suggests yet another situation in which Canada was vulnerable... as a kind of repository for extremist and related activity."

Harris, director of the International and Terrorist Intelligence Program of INSIGNIS Strategic Research, said Day, a former federal opposition leader, first alerted the Canadian public to the problematic nature of IRFAN in November 2004.

Relying on Israeli intelligence information, he warned the government of then-prime minister Paul Martin that there were "difficulties" associated with IRFAN, Harris said.

"It bears noting that if between 2005 and 2009, $14.6 million was channelled to inappropriate recipients associated with Hamas, that seems to be an indictment of the delay... Given the amount of harm it could cause, it should give us pause," he said. ■

Israelis stand silent for 25,664 fallen

ADIV STERMAN
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Millions of Israelis stood still in solemn silence Monday morning as sirens wailed throughout the country for two full minutes to mark Yom Hazikaron and to commemorate the 23,169 fallen soldiers and 2,495 terror victims who have died throughout the history of the State of Israel and the Zionist movement.

The sirens sounded at 11 a.m., bringing the country's bustling city centres and highways to a complete freeze. After the sirens, ceremonies commenced throughout the country, with some 1.5 million Israelis taking part in memorial events.

The official state memorial ceremony was held at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem and was attended by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, President Shimon Peres, and IDF Chief of Staff Benny Gantz, as well as other representatives of the IDF and the government.

"On this day, with a heavy heart and with our heads held high, with a sense of deep pain and pride, we all salute the fallen soldiers of Israel, our brothers and sisters, the heroes," Netanyahu said at the ceremony.

"We hurt over the sorrow of the widows and the grief of the orphans and the grief of the siblings. No pain in the world compares to the pain of parents who are informed of the falling of their children."

"I saw it up close when my parents were thrown into the dark pit of grief after the fall of my older brother," the prime minister said, referring to Yonatan Netanyahu,

OPINION

Forty years in the wilderness

Sagi Melamed

I had lunch recently with the ambassador to Israel of an Asian country. The ambassador told me about his various ambassadorial duties, then added, smiling faintly, "One of my main tasks is to report back on what is happening in Israel, particularly with regards to the chances of reaching a peace agreement. I have to summarize and analyze the issues and indicate the opportunities and risks, the main topics and the obstacles. But to tell the truth, that's a relatively easy job. All I have to do is find the computer file of one of my predecessors' reports from five or 10 years ago, change the date and the signature, and the report is 90 per cent ready to go… Not too much has changed. You're still squabbling with the Palestinians over the same issues: borders, refugees, Jerusalem, security… it gets a bit boring for us to keep reporting that to our governments."

Driving south to Tel Aviv, I listened to the morning news on the car radio. To mark the 35th anniversary of the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt, the radio station had dusted off various items of archived reportage, interviews and commentary from the political stars of that time: Menachem Begin, Ezer Weizman, Moshe Dayan, Ariel Sharon, Shimon Peres (of course) and others.

One of the commentators compared the fierce opposition 35 years ago to the peace agreement with Egypt to the opposition to a possible peace agreement with the Palestinians today. Here are three slogans of the time and their parallels today:

- "Uprooting settlements (in Sinai/in Judea and Samaria) will be the beginning of the end of Zionism."
- "We can't trust our bitterest enemy (the Egyptians/the Palestinians)."
- "Only the physical presence of the IDF (in Sinai/in Judea and Samaria and the Jordan Valley) can ensure Israel's security."

The first time I crossed the Israel-Jordan border via the Sheikh Hussein Bridge, some dozen years ago, I was moved almost to tears. I recalled how, as a child, I would visit my grandparent's tiny one-bedroom apartment on Kibbutz Ashdot Yaakov in the Jordan Valley. The sight of the Gilad Mountains on the eastern side of the Jordan River would cause me nightmares during my visits, as I was terrorized by thoughts of Jordanian mortar attacks and malevolent infiltrators. I have now crossed the Jordan more than 10 times since that first occasion, and my initial excitement has gradually given way to the feeling that this is a routine event.

Thinking back over the years, one can see that what today is routine and taken for granted was once thought to be impossible, a wild fantasy. Who, 60 years ago, would have believed that tens of thousands of Israelis would choose to live and work in Berlin? Who would have dared to dream, 70 years ago, that the United States would choose an African-American president?

Pesach is the Festival of Freedom, and Yom Ha'atzmaut is Israel's Independence Day. They represent more than just political freedom from the rule of others. They also represent our release from the chains of history and perception, of fear and trauma.

Moses needed 40 years in the wilderness because it was so difficult to find a patch of land in the Middle East without oil, says the famous joke (now outdated, with Israel's discoveries of natural gas and oil shale). But the more serious explanation ascribes the wilderness years to the long psychological journey from slavery to freedom, a transition that required a full 40 years to remove the slave's mental shackles and allow the Israelites to enter the Land of Israel as a free people, born to freedom.

Who will venture to predict the historical events, the drastic operations, the difficult steps that today seem to us to be impossible, yet will, a few decades hence, be understood in retrospect to have been the imperative of the hour? ■ who was killed during the rescue of Israeli hostages in Uganda during Operation Entebbe in 1976.

"It is a deep pit with slippery walls. It was difficult to emerge from it, and in a sense [my parents] never left it," he continued. "But it is possible to deal with the pain. You can continue, you can reintegrate again with the flow of life, you can create and build and contribute and strengthen others. But you must not forget, always remember and be comforted by the fact that the fallen gave their lives to build our state and to safeguard it."

According to the Defence Ministry, preparedness at the 44 military cemeteries nationwide was increased due to the extreme heat.

At 1 p.m. Monday, a separate commemoration for Israel's terror victims began at Mount Herzl.

Yom Hazikaron ended abruptly Monday evening with the start of celebrations marking Independence Day.

Israel came to a standstill Sunday evening at 8 p.m. for a minute-long memorial siren. The siren was followed by the lighting of a memorial flame to the fallen at the Western Wall, the site of the official state commemoration ceremony.

Speaking at a ceremony in the southern town of Kiryat Gat, Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman accused the Palestinians and their "sponsor," Iran, of rebuffing Israel's peace overtures.

"Each generation, the Israeli government has made every possible effort," to make peace with its neighbours, Liberman insisted. "But when there is no readiness from the other side, the matter becomes almost impossible.

"Our obligation, as a government, is first and foremost to take care of the security of the citizens of Israel," he continued.

"That obligation is absolute, and there will be no compromise on the matter, even with the threats from the Palestinian side… To every threat and provocation from the Palestinians, or their sponsors – that is to say, Iran – we will know how to give a proper and painful response. Our hand is outstretched in peace, but we will cut off any hand that threatens us." ■

Netanyahu aims to make Israel a Jewish nation-state

HAVIV RETTIF GUR
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu repeated his promise on Sunday to advance a constitutional Basic Law expressly identifying Israel as a Jewish nation-state.

Speaking at the start of his weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu rebuffed criticism of the plan, saying the state currently lacked "adequate expression" of Israel's "existence as the nation-state of the Jewish people" in the country's set of Basic Laws.

"It will define the national right of the Jewish people to the State of Israel, and will do so without harming the individual rights of all Israeli citizens in the State of Israel," he said. "It will fortify the Law of Return as a Basic Law. It will anchor in Basic Laws the status of the national symbols – the flag, the anthem, the language and other components of our national existence."

Explaining the immediate trigger for the bill, Netanyahu said Israel's Jewish status is under "constant and increasing assault from the outside, and even from within."

Israel doesn't have a constitution, but the country's set of Basic Laws have been given the standing of one by the courts.

As he did when announcing the legislative campaign last week, Netanyahu tied the new bill to the Israeli demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel as the Jewish nation-state.

"There are of course those who do not want the State of Israel to be defined as the nation-state of the Jewish People," he told the cabinet ministers. "They want to establish a Palestinian nation-state next to us, and that Israel slowly transform into a binational Arab-Jewish state in its shrunken borders.

"The State of Israel grants equal rights, full individual rights, to all its citizens. But it is the nation-state of one nation only – the Jewish nation – and not of any other nation. Therefore, in order to fortify Israel's status as the nation-state of the Jewish people I intend to lead the legislation of a Basic Law that will anchor this status," he said.

> "The State of Israel grants equal rights, full individual rights, to all its citizens."
> BENJAMIN NETANYAHU

Netanyahu first proposed the new initiative at a May 1 press event in Tel Aviv. His announcement immediately sparked debate between the right-wing and centre-left elements of his coalition on balancing the Jewish identification of the state with the country's democratic constitutional commitments. Netanyahu signaled on Sunday that he welcomed the debate, and that all sides would be heard.

"The new law will be drafted in a dialogue with all elements of the coalition, so that it protects the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state," he said.

Jerusalem's demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state had been one of the major sticking points in the recently ended round of peace negotiations, with Netanyahu saying he will never sign an agreement without it and the Palestinians refusing adamantly.

Even outside the framework of peace negotiations, Netanyahu's plan is likely to cause controversy, as some 20 per cent of Israel's population is not Jewish. ■

J Street vote: between fiasco and disaster

YEHUDA KURTZER
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

The surprisingly one-sided vote by the Conference of Presidents last week to reject J Street's membership reveals three major fallacies in American Jewish life, and provides us a moment – whether we revel or reel at this news – to learn something significant about our community.

The first major fallacy at play is the prevailing belief, suggested by this vote, that American Jews still constitute a polity whose consensus boundaries can be named and contained. If once upon a time "Jews earned like Episcopalians and voted like Puerto Ricans," we must now start to acknowledge – as was clear in the contentious Jewish debates about U.S. President Barack Obama and Israel leading up to the 2008 and 2012 elections – that Jews no longer think of themselves as an ethnically contained voting bloc, but rather are now divided, as is the rest of the country, into Jews who happen to be Democrats and Jews who happen to be Republicans.

Voting for J Street to stay on the sidelines is an attempt to sustain a polity that no longer exists and to imagine a firm dividing line between internal community dissent and external public debates. Consider: when right-wing Jews protest publicly outside UJA-Federation in New York as they did this week, blowing shofars and making noise against the policy of the Jewish community to include progressive Israel organizations such as the New Israel Fund in the Celebrate Israel Parade, they are ironically acknowledging that Jewish policy debates can no longer be defined as the internal workings of a coherent community. Intra-Jewish tensions are no longer the province of the board room, but apparently belong out in public at 59th Street and Lexington Avenue.

The fact J Street wanted in to the establishment meant that, in spite of policy differences with many of its members, it was ostensibly willing to try to belong to and perhaps even help sustain the declining Jewish consensus. The fact it's been kept out, essentially told to keep doing its work outside the framework of the normative community, actually reinforces the very breakdown of the communal structure from which Conference of Presidents is now a relic.

If once upon a time Jews agreed not to hang our dirty laundry in public, the American public square has become a Jewish laundromat – all with the tacit endorsement of what was once the community's mouthpiece and most influential instrument.

The second fallacy is the belief that the Jewish communal debate on Israel necessarily becomes more contentious when competing voices are brought around the table and that keeping ideas out of the room will succeed in suppressing them.

The debate on Israel and its policies is real, and ignoring or delegitimizing competing views that describe themselves as Zionist and pro-Israel – even if you think they are wrong – is both conceptually and strategically foolish. The theory behind keeping J Street out of the room is that its views are beyond the pale of reasonable debate and that bringing it to the table will poison the consensus. In truth, the naysayers have now actually constrained their ability to participate in and manage a debate that is now far larger and wider than what goes on at the conference and is outside the capacity of the conference to control.

No doubt the Jewish communal conversation on Israel needs a lot of work, though there are good initiatives underway (including by my own organization) that give room for optimism. But who thinks the conversation will improve when we reinforce the gravity of our differences rather than try to collaborate on the areas of agreement? The truth is, J Street won this vote: it and its supporters have campaigned for years to change what they have implicitly described as the echo chamber of the Jewish establishment. If ever there was proof of the point they have been making…

> The fact that J Street wanted in to the establishment meant that in spite of policy differences with many of its members, they were ostensibly willing to try to belong to and perhaps even help sustain the declining Jewish consensus; the fact that they are kept out, essentially told to keep doing their work outside the framework of the normative community, actually reinforces the very breakdown of the communal structure from which Conference of Presidents is now a relic.

The third major fallacy of the vote was the belief of Jewish organizational leaders that you can remain a leader and retain leadership while failing to respect and represent the views of those you are trying to lead. In the wake of the Pew Study, the Forward asked major Jewish leaders about the growing chasm between the attitudes on Israel expressed by their organizations and those expressed by the majority of the Pew respondents. Their response – as well as that of Evelyn Gordon of Commentary who came to their defence – was to create a hierarchy of authority privileging those who "know more" and "care more."

As Rabbi Jill Jacobs and I wrote then, this is partly true: leaders do possess a moral responsibility to sometimes act autonomously in the best interest of the people we represent, even if those actions are at times at odds with the people's own attitudes. But that approach is risky and must be managed carefully. To be credible, it must operate within a broader context of consistent curation of the consensus of the community.

One of the strange phenomena on the rise in the organized Jewish community is the belief that if people ask difficult questions, maintain dissenting views or even violate norms, the most effective response by leadership is to lash out, attack the questions or the questioners and close ranks.

Israel – like every other aspect of Jewish life today – is competing in the marketplace of ideas for American Jews. American Jews privilege their autonomy, and those who want to stay involved in Jewish life – especially younger Jews – are seeking honesty and authenticity from their leadership.

All is not lost for Jewish leaders seeking to be out in front, as people will still follow in search of meaning, community and all the other reasons why so many Jews still opt in to serious Jewish life. But foolhardy is the Jewish leader who believes the people will stay behind an organization because it has a history, an acronym or a history of successes leading a community that no longer shares the characteristics of the community of today.

So the conference vote is, frankly, something between a fiasco and a disaster. At best, the only thing we gained was a reality check on how the Jewish community and its leadership perceive itself in contrast to the realities in which it is living. Perhaps an outpouring of disappointment will help sway our leaders to understand this – maybe not to correct the vote, but at least to help them see things as they are and not hold on to some notion of what they once were. Otherwise, these fallacies become holes, and what use are umbrella organizations full of holes? ■

Open Letter to the Jewish Community

כשר COR

The Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) would like to initiate a dialogue with the community about our services and in the interests of transparency, discuss our fee structure, our business model and our origins.

COR is a not for profit registered charity dedicated to serving our community by providing kosher supervision. COR traces its origins back to 1952 when a group of committed lay and rabbinic leaders formed an organization that would look after the community's kosher needs. This effort was done in concert with the Canadian Jewish Congress and "Congress" looked after many of COR's administrative office functions.

As the food industry and its supply chain grew in complexity, so did the demands of effective kosher certification. COR was growing at a rapid rate which made the job of effective management by Congress difficult, and as a result, it was decided that COR should become its own legal entity. In 2000 the Kashruth Council of Canada was incorporated as a not for profit corporation.

During the latter 30 of the 50 years when COR was under the auspices of Congress, COR's practice was to operate with a small annual surplus for contingencies. So, a $20,000 annual surplus for 30 years invested at reasonable returns yielded over one million dollars. Congress realized that building an organization would require significant start-up costs so the cash reserves that COR had accumulated were earmarked for these expenses. New premises were rented, additional office staff was hired, accounting systems were developed and software was developed.

These start-up funds were put to good use on behalf of the kosher community. COR has built itself into one of the world's most respected kosher certifiers, implementing industry wide best practices and employing people who are experts in both food science and Jewish law. COR is available as a free consumer resource for anything kosher: from koshering people's homes to answering kosher questions. Last Passover alone COR answered approximately 2000 consumer questions. We appreciate the confidence that has been placed in us by the Jewish community and are honoured to serve you.

COR is a not for profit organization and all fees collected go towards covering our operations and providing services to the community. In the food service division (i.e. restaurants and caterers) we actually operate at a financial deficit – our expenses are greater than our fees. We are able to marginally compensate for this loss from our other divisions. Customers choose COR because they know that we are reliable, we provide professional service, and our prices are in line with the other major kosher certifiers.

COR offers its food service clients (i.e. restaurants and caterers) two options of supervision:

1. A full-time working mashgiach; or
2. Route supervision

A working mashgiach is an employee of the business who works in different capacities as required by the proprietor but is also trained by COR, responsible for the kosher program, and reports to a COR Senior Mashgiach. Establishments that choose a working mashgiach are charged only $300 per month. Those that choose route supervision are charged an average of $650 per month, not including the inspection of fruits and vegetables. Included in this fee are the multiple daily visits by a regular mashgiach and several monthly audits by a senior mashgiach. In the course of a month, a COR route mashgiach provides an establishment with between 25-35 hours of supervision.

COR's financial statements are audited annually by Grunwald and Co., an independent accounting firm and our financial data is available to the public on Canada Revenue Agency's website listed below[1]. COR's entire operations are supervised by both a board of rabbis and a board of lay representatives appointed by local synagogues in our community and includes accountants, lawyers and business people who ensure that our organization is being run responsibly and in the best interests of the Jewish community.

There is nothing COR wants more than to see our certified establishments prosper and for consumers to have access to kosher food at competitive prices.

A monument showing a Turkish soldier rescuing an Anzac soldier, and, right, a cove below the battlefield

Gallipoli a solemn reminder of war

NANCY WIGSTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

On a hot, cloudless afternoon our bus stops on a wild stretch of Turkey's coastline. A storybook shepherd pauses, allowing us to pass, his flock clustered behind him. Apart from a mild wind rustling through the pines, this acreage above the Dardanelles Strait seems empty, silent. It's hard to believe that this is Gallipoli, site of one of World War I's bloodiest battles.

Half a million soldiers fell here between April 1915 and January 1916. Though losses were massive – including an entire Turkish regiment – the Turks were successful in defending their homeland.

As for the young colonists from the far reaches of the then-British Empire, after being "nailed on the beach," in the words of Ikud, our guide – a mere 90 metres below these cliffs, the last troops from Australia and New Zealand withdrew from their trenches under cover of night in January, 1916.

Soon after the war, however, grieving Aussies and Kiwis began visiting the beaches, fields and trenches where their sons and countrymen had fallen. Eventually, Mustafa Kemal, or Ataturk, the charismatic Gallipoli leader and legendary father of the 1923 Turkish Republic, penned a moving letter to the Anzacs – the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. His warm greeting is today inscribed in stone above Anzac Cove:

"Those heroes that shed their blood and lost their lives, you are now lying on the soil of a friendly country. Therefore rest in peace. There is no difference between the Johnnies and the Mehmets to us, where they lie side by side. You, the mothers, who sent them from far away, wipe away your tears. Your sons are now sleeping in our bosom and are at peace after having lost their lives on this land. They have become our sons as well."

Ikud tells us that the French, however, who lost some 5,000 men at Gallipoli, tend not to visit. "They say they have other things to talk about." But Gallipoli became a transformative event for both Turks and Anzacs. The Aussies and Kiwis among us are visibly moved by seeing the places their troops nicknamed Lone Pine and Johnston's Jolly. As David, a traveller from Sydney, explains, "Every Australian child grows up knowing these names."

Down Under, they love their nicknames. "Tall? We call you 'shorty'. Red hair? We call you 'blue.'" The Turkish defenders were called "Johnny Turk." That's part of the legend. But no nicknames could make these unforgiving hills seem familiar to a youthful army that soon dug into trenches – which we see at a later stop – while plagued by heat, flies, dysentery – and the stench of their comrades' bodies.

Renowned Russian violinist to perform in Toronto

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In honour of Toronto-based impresario Svetlana Dvoretsky's 10th year showcasing mainly Russian artists, violinist Vladimir Spivakov and the Moscow Virtuosi chamber orchestra will be in concert May 9 at Roy Thomson Hall.

Spivakov and the Moscow Virtuosi will perform classical works by Mozart, Shostakovich, Piazzolla and Tchaikovsky.

After a chance meeting with Spivakov in downtown Toronto in 2003, Dvoretsky was given an opportunity to promote the violinist, an opportunity that seemed improbable at the time. Dvoretsky was a recent immigrant to Canada from Russia in 1998 and worked in retail sales, but had no background as an impresario.

However, she impressed Spivakov with her knowledge of the arts at their meeting, and he knew Dvoretsky's mother, a pianist Spivakov had studied with at the Rimsky-Korsokov Conservatory in Moscow.

"Mr. Spivakov told me, after a few more meetings, that he wanted me to meet his manager in New York so that I can be the presenter of his concerts throughout Canada. I was surprised, and I really appreciated having his trust. At the time, I had no budget, no background and no reputation yet as an impresario," Dvoretsky said.

Dvoretsky forged links with the growing Russian-Jewish community in Toronto and spread the word in Russian that Spivakov would be performing in Toronto. She had a sold-out audience for her first concert with Spivakov in 2004 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, netting $5,000 in profit for her company, Show One Productions.

"At the time, nobody in Toronto was promoting the classical artists from Russia that I knew about. Also, because of my fluency in Russian and knowledge of the community, I discovered that others I met grew up with a love of the classics, and I had an eager audience."

In her 10 years as an impresario, Dvoretsky has spread her wings to produce concerts in Montreal and Ottawa in addition to Toronto. Although she is including some non-Russian artists, among them Belgian singer Lara Fabian, on her roster of clients, Dvoretsky has found a loyal audience who have attended Show One Productions with Russian artists such as comic Maxim Galkin and singer Diana Arbenina.

She also has a strong affinity for her Jewish roots, becoming more immersed in celebrating holidays within the Russian Jewish community.

"I am proud to be Russian, but also to be Jewish as well, growing up proud of my Jewish background when I lived in St. Petersburg. I attend synagogue services for the High Holidays and for Pesach at a few Russian congregations in North York."

Dvoretsky wanted Spivakov to showcase her 10th anniversary, anticipating robust sales at the box office. "Spivakov is regarded by classical musicians as one of the best violinists in the world. The Moscow Virtuosi chamber orchestra that he founded is celebrating its 35th anniversary, so it is an honour to have him return to Toronto."

Born in Moscow, the 70-year-old Spivakov was a child prodigy, mastering the violin by age 13. He gained international prestige after his American debut with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1979.

He has worked with famed musicians such as Leonard Bernstein and Israeli conductor Pinchas Zukerman. Spivakov is the principal conductor of the National Philharmonic Orchestra of Russia.

Despite his fame, Spivakov never forgot being discriminated against in his youth because he is Jewish. "I was bullied as a child for being Jewish and took up boxing lessons to defend myself against gangs. I was also denied initially from attending the Rimsky-Korsokov Conservatory because I am Jewish. Fortunately, the ban on Jews was lifted when I was a teen."

Ironically the musician who was denied entry to the famed Russian conservatory won the highest honour in his country for his music, the National Cultural Heritage Award. ■

Vladimir Spivakov and the Moscow Virtuosi perform May 9, 8 p.m., at Roy Thomson Hall, 60 Simcoe St., Toronto. The audience is invited to a post-concert reception featuring jazz artist Daniel Nardi. Tickets, 416-872-4255 or www.showoneproductions.ca

NOVEL CHRONICLES DESCENT INTO ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE

Montreal-born novelist Eric Rill, whose first two books were the political thrillers Pinnacle of Deceit and The Innocent Traitor, was working on a third thriller when he put it aside to pen An Absent Mind, a novel describing a descent into Alzheimer's disease. Rill, who now lives in Panama, said he wrote the book after watching his father struggle with the disease for eight years.

"My goal was not only to write good fiction, but also to provide readers with a true picture of this dreaded disease that afflicts more than 35 million people worldwide," he explained. "I knew I had to write this book to share the challenges faced by caretakers and loved ones as they watch someone they love deteriorate before their eyes."

The book focuses on the fictional Saul Reimer, husband and father, whose slide into declining mental health is shown alongside the emotional rollercoaster ride shared by his wife and children. An Absent Mind was published this spring by Avante Press. www.ericrill.com

Captivating book examines Mussolini and Pope Pius XI

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Although the slaughter we call war has been a constant of human history, the first half of the last century may well be regarded in the infinite horizons of the future as the most gruesome period of time through which humanity lived and suffered.

The war to end all wars between 1914 and 1918, alas, did no such thing. It was merely the melancholy precursor to the unimaginably horrific killing that began in Europe in the mid-1930s, swept across the world like red, hot fire destroying dry sage and that stopped, if only officially, in 1945.

Europe was then a nasty, boiling stew of demagogic politics, seething resentments, economic fears, exploitative finger-pointing, xenophobia and vile scapegoating. The black-shirted Fascists of Italy, led by Benito Mussolini, were among those who lit the flame and ensured the cauldron would boil without cease or relent.

Mussolini was an intriguing individual.

A man of massive vanity but empty of moral substance, haughty ways but low education, pompous bearing but crude character, he mesmerized most of his countrymen for more than two decades. He abolished parliamentary democracy, beat up political opponents, and in some cases had them killed, ruled by intimidation and brutishness, enacted grotesque "racial laws", despised the Church and its encumbering moralities and yet gained the loyalty, if not also the affection, of a majority of his countrymen.

In the early 1920s Adolf Hitler considered Mussolini his mentor. (The Nazi pupil, we know, would vastly surpass the Fascist teacher in devising fiendishly evil plans.) Mussolini and his squadristi (gangs) of bullies and henchmen led their country to national ruin and shame.

That a thug could reach the pinnacle of political power in his country has many examples, ancient and modern. Rule by gun and truncheon can be very effective. But a structure built by fear eventually crumbles underneath the weight of its own cruelty.

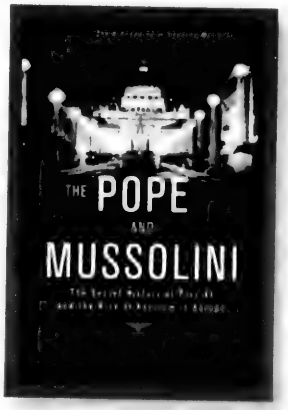
What has intrigued historians and has been the subject of argument and discussion over the years is the extent to which the Vatican opposed or aided him. Did the leadership of the Catholic Church in Italy inveigh and rail against the aggressive, roughhouse policies of Il Duce? Did they seek an accommodation with the dictator, as a way of lying low, so to speak, until the storm passed? Or did they actively and deliberately try to harness the storm, steering its wild winds away from causing harm to the clerical edifice they ruled?

In The Pope and Mussolini, Kertzer, a historian at Brown University, offers a definitive answer.

"The Vatican played a central role both in making the Fascist regime possible and in keeping it in power," Kertzer writes. "Far from opposing the treatment of Jews as second-class citizens, the Church provided Mussolini with his potent arguments for adopting just such harsh measures against them. The Vatican made a secret deal with Mussolini to refrain from any criticism of Italy's infamous anti-Semitic 'racial laws' in exchange for better treatment of Catholic organizations."

Not all the leaders of the Vatican were equally culpable in this enterprise. Indeed, Pope Pius XI grew increasingly to distrust Mussolini and regret his accommodations with him. It was his hope, as a last act before he died in 1939, to set the record straight and to unburden his conscience regarding Mussolini's "Un-Christian" policies with a specially written encyclical. But even this last act was thwarted by his fellow clerics who refused to distribute it.

Kertzer is uniquely qualified to write about the Vatican's relationship with Mussolini. The author of nine books, Mussolini and the Pope follows upon Kertzer's previous work, The Popes Against the Jews. In that book Kertzer examined the larger, equally delicate and difficult subject of how doctrinal Vatican teachings contributed to the proliferation of modern anti-Jewish sentiments.



The Pope and Mussolini: The Secret History of Pius XI and the Rise of Fascism in Europe
David I. Kertzer

(Random House)

> The Vatican played a central role both in making the Fascist regime possible and in keeping it in power

In researching these books, Kertzer relied upon the previously sealed Vatican archives for his primary material. Indeed it was the recently canonized Pope John Paul II himself who unsealed that period of Vatican archives and who invited Kertzer to examine the vast library of documents and to draw the appropriate conclusions from them.

Faithful to the pope's instructions, Kertzer followed the evidence and pulled no punches in both books.

For The Pope and Mussolini, Kertzer spent more than seven years in archival research, which included poring over previously sealed Vatican documents and thousands of pages of Italian, French, British, American and German diplomatic correspondence, diaries and memoirs.

Afterwards Kertzer could write: "That the Duce and his minions counted on the men around the pope to keep Pius XI's increasing doubts about Mussolini and Hitler under control is a story embarrassing for a multitude of reasons, not least the fact that the central player in these efforts was Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, the man who would succeed Pius XI.... With the opening in 2006 of the Vatican archives covering this dramatic period, the full story of these years, in all its richness, emotional highs and lows and surprises can finally be told."

The Pope and Mussolini is a captivating work told with a scholar's attention to detail and the narrative skill of a journalist. Kertzer lets the documents and the words written more than 75 years ago tell the story that history, morality and truth demand be told.

This was Pope John Paul II's wish. Kertzer has honoured the late pontiff's wishes with solemn clarity. ■

Cape Breton version of The Big Chill

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Actor Dov Mickelson makes his main stage debut at Toronto's Factory Theatre in a play described as a Cape Breton version of The Big Chill. Written by Governor General Award winner Daniel MacIvor, Bingo! is running until June 1.

Bingo! had its world premiere in MacIvor's home province of Nova Scotia and has since toured the country.

The play is about a group of 40-somethings in Nova Scotia getting together for their 30th high school reunion. Bingo is the name of the drinking game they play in their hotel room.

"I play Jeff MacInnis, but his nickname is Heffer. We all call ourselves by our nicknames," Mickelson says. "The other two guys are Dookie and Nurk. Boots and Bitsi are the girls. Boots, Bitsi and Heffer have not left town. Nurk has gone out west and is very successful, and Dookie is a big real estate guy in Halifax."

Mickelson says, tongue in cheek, that there is very little acting required because in some ways the cast is very close to the people they represent, as they are similar in age.

"Sometimes you have these friendships that last your whole life and sometimes you are friends with people, just because you were friends in high school. At any age this happens, when you reflect back at stages of your life, it is like time travelling and sometimes when you are with old friends, it's like picking up even though 30 years has passed between you.

"It is certainly the way my memory of how The Big Chill was, with all these old friends getting together," Mickelson says. "Although that movie was about the death of a friend. But, there can be comparisons for sure. The play is seemingly simple but it's complex, there are these little layers like an onion in it that are beneath the comedy that are discovered. It is a really beautiful script and I urge people to come see it for a great night of theatre."

The actor think it appeals not just to those in their 40s but to those of all ages because of the sense of looking back at our lives and where we are at. He thinks the play speaks a lot to love and friendships and to some of the quirkiness of small town living.

"Daniel MacIvor has a wonderful dark sense of humour. People who know his writing will appreciate it. There are several versions of how he wrote this play but one of them was that his brother challenged him to write a play for him that appeals to everybody."

Mickelson says his Judaism is part of his makeup and who he is. "I have done some playwriting and being Jewish has influenced some of the subjects that I have written about for sure."

Before moving to Toronto 13 years ago, Mickelson worked with Catalyst Theatre in his hometown of Edmonton. His other stage credits include On the Other Side of The World, The Winslows of Derryvore, Wizard of Oz, The Jones Boy, Dying to Be Sick and The Right Road to Pontypool. On film and television he was in Found Objects, The Associates and Finding Christmas for Hallmark. ■

For Canadians, Gallipoli may conjure memories of the 1981 Peter Weir film starring a fresh-faced Mel Gibson. English majors – I am one – might find themselves suddenly quoting out loud snatches of TS Eliot's dedication to his French friend in The Wasteland – "mort aux Dardanelles" inadvertently startling a Romanian tourist who's never heard of Eliot.

But just as it's said that our Canadian identity was forged at Ypres, Vimy Ridge, and the Somme, so Australians and New Zealanders consider that their national souls were forged right here, on this thin line between Europe and Asia Minor.

We walk past row upon row of neatly-kept headstones marking lives that ended at 17 and 20; a separate wall of names is brightened with red poppies. In Kabatepe War Museum we read letters and view history up-close – notably a bullet-pierced Turkish skull. Curiously, the same men who wrote home from "hell" voiced their respect for the "clean-fighting" Turkish soldier, leaving behind personal mementos such as watches, clothing, letters, as well as food rations for the enemy when they slipped away that winter night.

During some of the worst fighting – Aug. 12, 1915 – Second Lieutenant Stewart Fawkes wrote home that he suddenly "came round again." Looking up, he "saw many Turks around me with kind and tender looks. In the Turkish trench that I was previously trying to subjugate, they gave me water and food, and brought me to a first aid place, carrying me on their shoulders. I am really thankful for this magnanimous…humane treatment." Such was Aussie/Kiwi respect for the Turks that they refused the issue of gas masks because they didn't believe "Johnny Turk" would use gas against them.

About a month into battle, a ceasefire was called so the dead could be buried. Our guide tells stories about soldiers offering chocolates and sweets to one another while trying to communicate in sign language. "Why are you invading us?" asked the amazed Turks when they discovered their enemies came from Australia and New Zealand. Why indeed. In Ikud's words, "Churchill had blundered." That April day proved a disaster for the British Empire. In today's ANZAC Day's parades, the only foreign flag flown belongs to the Republic of Turkey.

The First Lord of the Admiralty's plan seemed feasible: wrest control of the vital Dardanelles Strait in a naval battle, thereby securing supply routes to Russia and hastening the war's end and the fall of the tottering Ottoman Empire, "the sick man of Europe." Instead, the British, French, and colonists from Newfoundland and the Anzacs – those soldiers whose graves are at our feet, "just boys wanting an adventure, a trip," says one Australian – encountered an implacable foe.

Anzac Day forever marks April 25, 1915, when troops landed on these shores, losing 2,000 men to gain 900 yards. "Getting ashore was not hard," wrote one soldier. "Hanging on, up on that ridge, for eight months, that was hard." Their stories live on. As many as 15,000 visitors have attended dawn Anzac Day services on this meticulously kept national park, welcomed by those whose forefathers fought them a lifetime ago. ■

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Hanging on to life

Dr. Michael Gordon

We all know that we are not immortal. But most people go through life thinking of the end as "over there," sort of like the end of a rainbow.

We usually talk about death in the abstract unless it occurs to someone dear to us. Then, a whole range of emotions surfaces. But our own death is an abstract, even for the practical and action-oriented people who plan for their funerals, make sure all their documents are in order, write their eulogies and carefully construct their wills and living wills. But it is still, for most, "over there."

With all the discussion in the past few years about advance care planning, with its emphasis on conversations with your loved ones accompanied by the implementation by many of living wills, one would think that attempts to stretch out the end would be rare, and perhaps only for those with strong religious reasons.

It might be thought that most people, especially when there are few if any medical options and quality of life is severely compromised, would accept death with a degree of equanimity. In such cases, whether it is the person making the decision or a substitute decision maker (SDM), such decisions might be made with the main focus of treatment on comfort, compassion and care, which would be within the usual principles of palliative and end-of-life care.

In the usual models of palliative and end-of-life care, the focus is primarily on symptom management, with a special but not exclusive focus on pain. Many people erroneously believe that pain is the primary source of suffering at the end of life, especially in the face of malignancies. Actually, other symptoms are no less important, but within the broad practices and principles of palliative care, most disquieting and uncomfortable symptoms can be controlled and people's suffering alleviated.

With this background, I found it somewhat surprising that, according to a large-scale study that's repeated on a periodic basis, the percentage of individuals, be they patients or SDMs, who request more acute medical interventions at the end of life is in fact growing.

This spread between those prepared to accept symptomatic care as they approach the end of life and those who ask that "everything medically that can be done should be done" flies in the face of the expectations of the medical community and of those who have promoted advance care planning.

So how does one explain this quest for prolonged life even when many would say the life is without any quality, or there appears to be excessive suffering or that further treatments would be futile?

The study looked at as many factors as possible that might explain such expectations and hopes, and there was no consistency from religious, social, ethnic or other parameters that stood out. Maybe it is something more profound and a reflection of the absence of the rituals and rites associated with the end of life that existed prior to the modern medical era.

Families hovering, religious people saying prayers, family members reciting favourite poems or singing favourite melodies, or the aroma of scented candles or special herbs and spices, the chanting of hymns – all these old-fashioned rituals have been replaced by the pinging of monitors, the wrist band of identification, the computer-generated test results and the discussions of evidence-based options and salvage treatments.

Even the idea of using CPR on a person who is clearly dying is now sometimes considered part of the "normal" menu offered by modern medicine. It's important because after it is all over, when family and friends discuss and review the person's life and the last days, family members can say that "everything that can be done was done." Rarely is there any acknowledgment that much of what was done had no impact on the actual outcome, but it may have affected how loved ones look back on the event in ways that reinforce their feelings of love and devotion to the person who "passed away," the phrase often used euphemistically for "died." ■

Yacov Fruchter explores Judaism's revolutionary slavery laws and the concept of arevut
Rabbi Shalom Spira searches for the sweet spot between capitalism and socialism
Rachael Turkienicz considers two important Jewish numbers: seven and 50

Yacov Fruchter

For most young Jews today, feeling a connection to, and respect for, people who aren't Jewish is a given. What's becoming more challenging to grasp is the value of arevut – the idea that Jews have a special connection and responsibility toward one another.

Recently, one of my bar mitzvah students questioned whether helping one person over another simply because they're Jewish is a form of racism. This question isn't unique.

In Parshat Behar, we're presented with what Rabbi Jonathan Sacks describes as a "revolutionary template for a society of justice, freedom and human dignity." Reminded that we were slaves in Egypt, the Torah commands us against charging interest on loans to fellow Jews and offers clear guidelines on how to treat a Jewish slave who is under our control: "They are to be treated as an employee and as a resident."

Southern U.S. slave-owners treated their slaves as property. Considered in that light, the laws in this Torah portion are revolutionary. But are they enough?

Maimonides famously asked why the Torah doesn't go further and completely abolish slavery? My student would surely ask: "Why are only Jewish slaves given special treatment, and why are we only forbidden to charge interest to Jews? Shouldn't all people be treated justly?"

Rabbi Sacks quotes Maimonides in saying that humanity must be ready to take the next step. "God wanted mankind to abolish slavery, but by their own choice, and that takes time."

If the Torah introduced these restrictions on slavery as a way to move us toward justice, is the same true about our relationships with non-Jews? Our value of arevut should continue to be a model for how a group can care for one another. As we count the days from freedom to responsibility, we should remember that we can have a unique relationship with our fellow Jews without treating others unjustly. ■

Yacov Fruchter is spiritual leader of Toronto's Annex Shul.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"Do not take from him usury… and your brother shall live with you" (Leviticus 25:36). This verse presents an economic paradigm that blends socialism with capitalism.

On the one hand, loans must be extended interest-free, as detailed by the Talmud in the fifth chapter of Bava Metzia. On the other hand, the final phrase of the verse is elucidated by Bava Metzia 62a to mean that a thirsty desert traveller possessing a canteen must drink his own water to save his own life, before irrigating his thirsty compatriot. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggerot Mosheh, Yoreh De'ah I, no. 145) derives from the latter exposition the principle that no one is obligated to give charity until his own needs are already met.

True to form, Iggerot Mosheh subsequently rules (Even ha-Ezer II, no. 1) that a junior brother may marry before a senior brother, because every person is authorized to ensure his own welfare before addressing the needs of others. (Finding a spouse for a single gentleman is encompassed under the rubric of charity, as per the Gemara in Ketubot 67b.)

The canteen scenario also presents a corollary question: how does a self-sufficient canteen-owner choose between one of two thirsty compatriots dying before him? Interestingly, Chazon Ish contradicts himself: in his Likutim on Bava Metzia 62a, he says to give all the water to one compatriot, yet in his glosses on Chiddushei Reb Chaim le-Hilchot Yesodei ha-Torah, he says to divide the water between the two. The latest edition of Jewish Law Annual features an article by Dr. Mark Wainberg, director of the McGill AIDS Centre, endeavouring to reconcile these contradictory pronouncements and using them as a basis for addressing the current HIV global pandemic.

Ultimately, Leviticus 25:36 teaches us that selfishness (capitalism) ennobled by selflessness (socialism) can best secure humanity's welfare. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

Parshat Behar details two important time elements: the sabbatical year, occurring every seven years, and the jubilee year, occurring every 50, which involve agricultural restrictions as well as land transaction reversals.

Today, many Jews might feel a disconnect, since agriculture and land transfer transactions in Israel are not part of our daily existence. The words "sabbatical" and "jubilee" sound wonderful, since we know they mean rest and celebration. In fact, they seem to mean rest and celebration in the extreme, as we don't usually describe things using those words. They're quite positive and should begin to speak to us again beyond their technical definitions.

The sabbatical year is the seventh year and jubilee is the 50th. The Torah brings these two numbers to us as focal points in our lives. The technical details give us the roots we need, but we might miss the overlay of meaning.

In Judaism, seven is the number of completion. The universe was created in seven days. The first verse of the Torah contains seven words. There are seven laws of Noah and there are seven matriarchs and patriarchs. Under the chupah, there are seven blessings and the bride circles her groom seven times to weave their souls together. The Hebrew word for completion is shalem, which gives us the word shalom, peace. Peace is the embodiment of Jewish completion.

The number 50 connotes age and wisdom. According to Jewish tradition, at 50 you may advise others, for you have understood that there are 50 windows in the sky that lead to 50 gates of reason. In other words, the world is seen through prisms of perspectives.

Just as our head is reeling with thoughts of grandeur and pride, the parshah reminds us that all our land belongs to God and that we ourselves are owned by God. The word behar means "at the mountain," and like mountains, we keep our feet on the ground, but our thoughts can soar. ■

Rabbi Englander: Reflecting on past 40 years at Solel

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Mississauga's Congregation Solel will honour Rabbi Lawrence Englander and his wife, Cheryl, at a gala dinner May 25. The rabbi, 65, will retire at the end of June. He first served Solel as a student rabbi in 1973, when only a dozen families were involved. The Reform congregation has since grown to 300.

A member of the Order of Canada known for interfaith community work, Rabbi Englander shared reflections and memories in a recent interview.

Many people still think of you as the rabbi who plays guitar. What role has music played at Solel?

I think I was the first rabbi in Canada to play guitar for services. Now there's hardly a rabbi ordained from Hebrew Union College who doesn't play guitar or some kind of musical instrument. I think that's reflective of a change in the Reform movement in general to much more accessible folk melodies that people want to sing, not just listen to. Music is a huge part of our service.

What stands out in your memory about the early days of the congregation?

There was no organized Jewish community when I first came out. One of Solel's founding members was a postman, and when he saw a mezuzah, he'd knock and say, "We're starting up a shul." I think our founding members made a huge sacrifice to get the synagogue on its feet. Every board member had to pledge money in trust. That was a very brave measure. When I was ordained in 1975, the congregation had grown to about 55 families, and they made a stretch to hire me.

How has the Jewish community in Mississauga changed over the past few decades?

One of the things I'm really proud of is that we've established a presence in the Mississauga community. Mississauga as a city came into existence [in 1974] by sewing together all kinds of small towns. We've really grown up together, which means we've been able to have an impact.

Solel was one of the founders of what was then called Foodpath – now the Mississauga Food Bank. I think it's the second biggest in Ontario.

How is Pathway connected to Foodpath?

Rabbi Lawrence Englander

> One of the things I'm really proud of is that we've established a presence in the Mississauga community. Mississauga as a city came into existence [in 1974] by sewing together all kinds of small towns. We've really grown up together, which means we've been able to have an impact.
> Solel was one of the founders of what was then called Foodpath – now the Mississauga Food Bank. I think it's the second biggest in Ontario.

Pathway [a non-profit housing corporation] kind of spun off from Foodpath. We wanted to see if there was a way to get people out of this cycle of poverty. Solel [and two churches] got a government grant, and put up an apartment building. I think at least one-third of the units are heavily subsidized. We also built a second building. We feel very proud that hundreds of families have been able to get a leg up through the program.

Was it a culture shock when you moved to Mississauga after growing up in Toronto?

It was. I think Toronto Jews have the impression that – Jewishly – the world falls off at [Highway] 427. Nothing can be further from the truth. My colleague in Oakville, Rabbi Stephen Wise, has a very active congregation, too. We have joint programming together, and with Rabbi Jordan Cohen in Hamilton. We have our own beit din among our three congregations. [Actually] four – Rabbi Lori Cohen in Kitchener-Waterloo is also part of that, and we run our own conversion program.

What type of interaction do you have with the Toronto Jewish community?

I meet with the Toronto Reform rabbis every month, as do rabbis Wise and Cohen. I'm a member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

What highlights stand out for you at Solel?

Kids that were bar and bat mitzvah are now having their children becoming bar and bar mitzvah. I've had a couple of instances where I've married a couple and now I've married their children. We've had people who took our teacher training program and have become wonderful teachers. And people who studied the Torah trope, and chant very beautifully. That, to me, has been very fulfilling.

What is your role as a teacher at Solel?

I think it's one of the most important parts of my rabbinate. I teach an adult Tanach class and the confirmation class. Also, the kindergarten class invites me in every year to do a mock wedding.

What type of relationship do you have with Chabad of Mississauga?

Rabbi [Yitzchok] Slavin and I see each other from time to time. I'd say we've each built our own constituency. I think we attract a different type of person so, you know, we get along fine.

What have been your biggest challenges?

I guess the biggest challenge was just to get the congregation going. I think the current challenge is one that congregations in general are facing. People in their 20s and 30s have a different concept of community, and of joining. So to connect them with congregations requires a bit more creative thinking than in the past.

Why are you retiring now?

I think, after 41 years, I'm ready to try new things. Also, I wanted to quit at the top of my game. What influenced me a lot is a book called Encore, by Marc Freedman.

Did you always plan to become a pulpit rabbi?

I planned to become an academic [after ordination]. Then along came Solel, and everything changed. It was like the congregation of my dreams. However, academic studies have always been important to me. I did get a doctorate in 1984 through Hebrew Union College.

What has your wife's involvement been?

Cheryl has been extremely active not only in the shul, but in Mississauga. She was chair of Credit Valley Hospital and served 12 years on its board. She founded Pathway Community programs in our two buildings. She's been on Solel's membership committee and is the international languages co-ordinator for our school. She also worked for the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism as their social action co-ordinator.

Is someone in place to be your successor?

Solel very wisely decided that they're going to have a one-year interim rabbi, which I think is catching on a lot in synagogues. Rabbi Ilene Bogosian will start in July.

What are your post-retirement plans?

Spending more time with my wife! Certainly we hope to spend more time in Israel. I'm chair-elect of [the Reform Zionist organization] Arzenu. I'll be in Israel at least three times a year for meetings. I'm also hoping to do more teaching, especially adult education. ■

One people?

Backstory

CARL EHRLICH

One often hears Jews complaining about how good it must have been in the past, when we truly were one people united in our religious and political practices and beliefs. How idyllic things were until the (fill in the blank with your least favourite Jewish group) came along and messed everything up!

The problem is this attitude is a load of kosher hogwash. When one looks at the long history of the Jewish People, one discovers we have rarely, if ever, been united on issues of central concern to the Jewish community.

One of the great myths of Judaism is that it has remained unchanged for thousands of years. To some extent, this is a consequence of the success of rabbinic Judaism's imposition of its religious worldview on what had been a disparate religious community until the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in 70 CE.

The rabbis were able to assert their authority by means of their theology of the Oral Torah, through which they claimed – with great success – that their idiosyncratic interpretations of Jewish law and custom were as old and as authoritative as the Written Torah itself.

But the Tanach, the Hebrew Bible, bears witness to differing interpretations of religion and peoplehood. While the biblical text implies that prophetic monotheism was the original and proper form of worship in ancient times, the truth appears to have been more nuanced than that. The overwhelming majority of modern scholars would posit that the common religion of biblical times until relatively near the time of the destruction of the First Temple by the Babylonians (586 BCE) was not what we would consider a monotheism in the strict sense. These scholars would assert that it was only following the Babylonian destruction that the religion propagated by the prophets became pre-eminent.

Another tension in the biblical text is between north and south, Israel and Judah, the two Israelite kingdoms. It is axiomatic that winners write history. Since Israel was destroyed about 150 years before Judah, and since Judaism is derived from the religion of Judah, it is no surprise the Bible should reflect a Judean perspective on religion and politics, arguing for the centrality of Jerusalem and its central sanctuary, the Temple, in addition to the sole legitimacy of its ruling dynasty of David and his successors. Nowhere is this clearer than in the encoding of explicit criticism of the northern cult in the story of the Golden Calf.

But even the prophets themselves were not above some propagandizing on behalf of their chosen communities. Sitting in exile in Babylon, the prophet and priest Ezekiel responded to accusations that those in exile had been cut off from their land and their God as divine punishment for their sins. On the contrary, he argued it was the people who remained in the land who had forfeited their religious and political rights. God had abandoned Jerusalem and was now to be found among the exiles.

In this manner, Ezekiel unwittingly gave birth to a Diaspora theology that enabled Judaism to adapt and survive through the ages. Indeed, it has always been Judaism's ability to reinvent itself in response to crisis that has ensured its survival.

First, biblical Israel responded to Babylonian conquest and exile by becoming a community that declared a diaspora kosher, in contradistinction to the expected rules of behaviour. Later, the rabbis responded to failed revolts against Rome by turning inward and replacing Temple and priesthood with synagogue and rabbinate.

We are currently in another period of crisis, as Judaism and the Jewish community attempt to respond to the challenges of modernity, of the Holocaust and of the redemptive rebirth of Israel, all within a relatively short span of time. Many answers have been put forward, but no consensus on how to proceed has emerged.

While we all harbour our own opinions on how to respond, we must remember that Judaism has always struggled with different responses to various challenges. These responses are examples of Judaism's ability to adapt and survive. Although we may disagree with each other about how to respond, we must remember that these are machlokot le-shem shamayim, "struggles for the sake of heaven." ■

Joseph Lebovic and Dr. Steven Gallinger, who treated Joseph's brother Wolf

When a surgical team saves your brother's life, his return to health is your reward. Imagine then, another scenario.

Joseph Lebovic's brother Wolf needed surgery and he was referred to renowned specialist, Dr. Steven Gallinger, at Toronto General Hospital. The outcome was successful, and the story might have ended there – but for the brothers' gratitude and generosity.

Their donation of $5 million recognizes the effort and excellence of Dr. Gallinger and his team in UHN's Division of General Surgery and supports UHN's Hepato-Pancreatico-Biliary Surgery Program. The largest program of its kind in Canada, it's led by Dr. Gallinger and provides comprehensive care for patients with liver, pancreatic and/or biliary disorders.

Thanks to the extraordinary generosity of Joseph and Wolf Lebovic, Dr. Gallinger and his team have experienced what leadership, compassion and innovation looks like when it comes full circle.

Samuel sells you cottages

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There is a piece of paradise to be had not too far from Toronto.

And Jack Samuel can help you own it.

The Harvey Kalles realtor (416-441-2888), who has been practising real estate for 30 years, has spent the past decade selling lakefront property on the west side of Lake Simcoe.

"About 10 years ago, I began this niche area, which wasn't being served by anyone from Toronto," Samuel said. "It was being served by local agents, but most of the buyers and sellers are from Toronto.

"Because I'd spent so many years up there, I knew a lot of the people selling, and understood the area very well."

Samuel has been going up to Belle Ewart for years and has fond memories there.

"My family has owned a cottage property for generations," said Samuel, who was also a camper and counsellor at nearby Camp Arrowhead, a popular day camp for those cottaging in the area. "Ever since I was a child, we spent our summers on the Lake Simcoe waterfront."

The proximity to the Greater Toronto Area is a big reason why a lot of people look for cottages off of Lake Simcoe.

"One of the big selling features is that many of the cottages are less than an hour from Toronto," Samuel said. "It may not be as rustic and remote as Muskoka, but you're saving the commute of at least two hours each week.

"If you're a weekender who goes up Fridays and comes home Sunday evenings, then those saved hours are much appreciated by the end of the summer."

Samuel sells properties from as far south as Lefroy up to Big Bay Point, which are various areas all within the municipality of Innisfil.

"There's a lot of Jewish people who have had cottages there for years and a lot who buy, and there's two synagogues that operate up there every summer," Samuel said. "The day camp up there, Camp Arrowhead, is affiliated with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and operates on the level of an overnight camp with sailing, kayaking and canoe trips, but the children come from the area and go home at night.

"You have religious people buying, secular people buying, and everyone in between," Samuel added. "You're 50 minutes from Toronto, 25 minutes to Rama, near golf courses, synagogues, and theatres in Barrie, which is 15 minutes away.

"When you're sitting on your dock on your property, looking at the lake, you feel isolated from the world and have this serenity and beautiful relaxing experience, but then if you need to be near a big-box store, you're a 10-minute drive away."

Lake Simcoe provides a number of different options when it comes to both the waterfront and the cottage.

"Every kind of place is there," Samuel said. "There are places strictly for summer, and there are winterized homes with lots of [luxuries] that can be used in all four seasons, so it's very broad in terms of price point and amenities.

"As far as the waterfront goes, it can range from deep water to sandy beach and everything in between."

Whatever the place is, Samuel has seen the meaning it can have to a family.

"I'm really a firm believer that the sale of a waterfront property is way more emotional and traumatic than that of a home a family has had for 20-30 years," Samuel said. "There are way more memories connected to a cottage experience that are intergenerational and very meaningful.

"I think it's a great investment for families that want to spend time with their kids in a casual, comfortable environment, and you can really cement some wonderful experiences."

Bath Fitter makes it quick and easy

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Redoing a bathroom can be a long, expensive ordeal.

But that won't be the case if you go through Bath Fitter (416-742-0429).

For three decades, Bath Fitter has been making faster and less expensive alterations than most home renovators, and they look good and work great.

"We do acrylic tub liners and seamless one-piece wall units. As opposed to a typical bathroom renovation where you rip everything apart, we're able to come in and fit the acrylic over an existing bath or shower, saving a lot of the time, expense and mess of a typical bathroom renovation," said Craig Snooks of Bath Fitter.

"We're typically two-thirds to half the cost of a typical bathroom renovation, and we're able to do most installations in one day."

Putting it over the existing setup is still a very sturdy and strong option, he said.

"It's a vacuum-formed acrylic wall," Snooks said. "We do all kinds of vacuum-formed tile appearances as well as 'marble walls,' meaning it's acrylic but has the look of marble."

Bath Fitter only employs licensed plumbing contractors and licensed home renovators, and since nothing is subcontracted, they can stand behind their work.

"We also give a lifetime guarantee for as long as you own the home," Snooks said. "We've got something in the neighbourhood of 200 offices across North America now, and they all give free in-home estimates."

New bathroom – no muss no fuss

Snooks has found some of his most common work has been to make tubs and showers more comfortable and convenient for the older generation.

"The conversion units [in which we] take out a bathtub and put in a walk-in shower are becoming quite popular," Snooks said. "For seniors, it's popular to help them maintain mobility at home, as they can get in and out of a tub.

"It's a home adaptation that really helps people stay in their homes longer," Snooks added. "We do all of the safety things as well, in terms of hand-held showers, shower seats, grab bars, and a wheelchair-accessible shower that we're able to install."

Another popular item from Bath Fitter is the soaker tub.

"It's a bit more comfortable than a typical tub [because it allows] you to lie back, and it has armrests as well," Snooks said.

There isn't too much complication involved when working with Bath Fitter.

"People can call us and we give out free estimates with no obligation," Snooks said. "What it does is allow us to get into the home and see what they might need specific to their bathroom, and then we're able to give them an exact price."

From there, customers can either come into the showroom to get a look at options, or they can proceed with the estimate.

"Typically, in two or three weeks, we're ready to come in and do the installation," Snooks said. "They're ready to use the following morning, so there's a minimal disruption to the home.

"We do offer very competitive finance programs, so we're able to finance the job for the customer if necessary."

It's a realistic option for people looking to move or for those planning to stay where they are, he said.

"Some people are doing the upgrade because they want their home to be more marketable, and others [want to] stay in their home and make it more comfortable," Snooks said.

"It's quite reasonable compared to what your options are. We're able to save you a lot of money on the typical bathroom renovation of this nature."

Bath Fitter has an office on Arrow Road, near Finch Avenue and Highway 400. ■

Pamper yourself with a sensational shower

NEWS CANADA

You do it every day – and sometimes more than once a day – but how often do you actually think about your shower routine? Does it live up to its potential?

You do deserve the pampering, so with the following six simple steps, your shower escape can become sensational and safe – and all of it with only a minimal investment:

Step 1: Start the Shower

When turning on the shower, are you greeted with a sensational stream, or a wimpy wash? To create a sensational shower, be sure you start with a quality showerhead – and upgrading it is simple. Just unscrew your current showerhead, wrap some plumber's tape around the arm, and screw on the new showerhead. A rainshower, for example, is a popular choice to provide quality coverage – and there are many options at affordable prices.

Step 2: Pamper with Products

Did you know that men cite "having too many items cluttering up the space" as their number one pet peeve in the shower? And while we don't want to part with your favourite body wash, shampoo, or conditioner, it's easy to add a bit of organization with a shower shelf. And for safety, go a step further. Moen says their new Designer Grab Bars with Shelves (in the Home Care line) give you a stylish shelf storage solution. You can get both the corner and straight varieties – while also adding the safety of a grab bar.

Affordable décor has never looked so good

NEWS CANADA

The idea of redesigning your living space can be an intimidating one, especially when the thought of how much the décor you desire will cost you. We never want to settle, so stretching our dollars to create the home of our dreams is commonplace. However, there are helpful tips for designing on a budget, says Sally Morse, creative director at Hunter Douglas, a leading window fashions company. Take a look at these:

Don't be a match maker: "Décor that's too matchy will date your space," says Morse. Instead of spending extra dollars for a matching set, mix new and old pieces to save and add flair to your style. Choose a favourite colour or match your fun accents instead of aligning major pieces. Or, reupholster existing furniture to refresh your space without spending on new items.

Buy recycled: Today, companies big and small have incorporated recycling and an awareness of the environment into their business models – and Hunter Douglas is no exception, Morse points out. Modern Precious Metals aluminum blinds, for example (now with two new finish options) are made from 95 per cent recycled material and are guaranteed to last a lifetime without fading, bowing or warping, making your investment all the more worthwhile and a savvy buy. Additional items that caught the eye of Morse recently were kitchen counters created of paper (PaperStone) and graceful chairs composed of old mattress springs (Susan Woods of Aswoon).

Make it last: The new Venue fabric (in Applause honeycomb shades from Hunter Douglas) comes with MicroShield antimicrobial fabric protection, which resists the growth of mold, mildew and bacteria, helping to preserve your window treatments. The Vintage fabric option also supports the new recycling trend, and is made of 40 per cent recycled fabric with 10 colours from which to choose. With so many shade varieties and options for light control, don't skimp at the window. "Lighting truly changes the overall look and feel of a room so it's an important aspect of decorating that shouldn't be forgotten," says Morse.

Do it yourself: The best tip for do-it-yourself projects is to think ahead and make sure you have additional materials on hand. "Make sure whatever directions you're following are clear, and use sites like Pinterest for inspiration and fun ideas."

With tips like these, creating a home that shows your style without breaking the bank decreases the intimidation factor and invites excitement into the decorating process. ■

Host your guests hotel-style

NEWS CANADA

A beautiful hotel can certainly make an impact, but ultimately it's the service that makes lasting impressions. Successful hotels earn repeat customers by providing top-notch service and making their guests feel special

As a host, whether it's a dinner party or visiting relatives, having our guests leave appreciative and with a smile on their faces is also the ultimate goal – along with surviving the experience, of course. So the hotel experts at Comfort hotels have put together a helpful list of tips to take your guests'w experience to the next level.

Plan a welcome treat: Whether they've got a sweet tooth or love the bubbly, a box of chocolates or a bottle of sparkling wine can go a long way. It's a simple gesture that can have a lot of impact and is the perfect way to greet your new guests.

Stock up on extra toiletries: We all know what it's like to forget something at home when we're on the road, whether it's a toothbrush, conditioner or floss. At hotels many guests rely on the travel-sized amenities, but when staying with family or friends, you could potentially be stuck without or, worse yet, be forced to share the soap. Leave new toiletries in the guest bathroom with a note letting them know to help themselves.

Make a set of spare keys: Just like you have a room key at the hotel, by giving your guests a spare set of keys, it'll take some of the co-ordination out of the visit. With their own keys, guests can come and go as they please without you having to co-ordinate being home from work or staying up if they're going for a night out.

Make a city tip sheet: Assuming your guests are new to the area and you're not available 24/7 to act as tour guide, a list of local attractions and dining options with contact information is a thoughtful way to help your guests plan their days.

Have snacks and bottled drinks: Providing your guests with portable treats and beverages like water and juice is a thoughtful gesture if you know they'll be out and about exploring. It'll save them additional costs and it's a nice touch that is easy to execute.

Plan household chores in advance: Do any laundry you have sitting around before your guests arrive to ensure the machines are free if needed. As well, any meal prep that can be done in advance will go a long way once you are busy entertaining.

A little planning can go a long way towards minimizing your stress and maximizing your guests' trip. So next time you have visitors coming, consider these six tips to make it a memorable and positive experience for all. ■

Solve your clutter problems

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of today's biggest challenges in the home is finding enough space to put all your belongings in a place you'll be able to find them again.

The problem continues to grow, as condominium apartments drop in size. In fact, Toronto's average condominium apartment size has significantly dropped over the past six years from 2.5 per cent smaller for one-bedroom units to as much as 16 per cent smaller in some cases.

Even living in a good-sized home doesn't make you immune to the clutter problem, especially when you're buying kitchen items in bulk and looking for a place to store them, or when you're trying to organize your kids' toys.

On the never-ending quest to create storage and space, adding pull-out or sliding shelves can be the simple, inexpensive solution you need. Gliding Shelf Solutions (1-877-895-9766; www.glidingshelf.ca) is Canada's largest and most experienced pull-out shelf company and they saw a big need for an easy solution to help people organize their home. Their custom-built pull-out shelves can fit into any home (old or new), any living space (including those hard-to-find-anything hidden kitchen corners), at a low price.

"You can dramatically increase space with pullouts, with no need for expensive renovations," said Marianna Keselman, Gliding Shelf Solution's dealer for Toronto and the Greater Toronto Area.

"It can be done in your existing cabinets, so there's no need to gut everything. You can have a brand new kitchen at a fraction of the cost." The product is particularly popular for seniors who are downsizing and need to maximize space in their new home, as well as young couples who have limited space.

"You move into a home and you think you have enough space and then babies come and toddlers come and you have to find additional space for [all] types of items and you can't," she said.

"With younger families, you can allocate a pull-out shelf for your kids to be able to set the table or get stuff on their own instead of climbing onto counter tops and injuring themselves, and the same with seniors."

Oaken FINANCIAL

Plant for your future™

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There are more financial options out there than just "the big five".

And one new brand of an existing financial institution is leading the way.

Oaken Financial (1-855-OAKEN22 (625-3622), which is a trademark of Home Trust, began its work in November, with Guaranteed Investment Certificates and savings accounts that give better rates than its competitors.

"Some people like to gamble on the stock market, but that's not for everybody," said Benjy Katchen, vice-president of deposits for Oaken Financial.

"But there are people who just want to have simple GICs or savings accounts, and we feel that some of the companies that used to be very competitive in that space are no longer as aggressive or independent as they used to be."

Katchen listed former options, such as Ally Financial, which was taken over by RBC, and ING Direct, which has since rebranded as Tangerine under Scotiabank, as companies that used to offer great rates.

"I don't feel that the interest rates [Tangerine] offers customers now are as competitive as they were in the early days of ING Direct," Katchen said of Tangerine. "That's the space we're trying to fill.

"It's a very simple product suite," Katchen added. "There are no gimmicks, just good GICs and savings accounts."

There are people at various stages in life that Katchen feels this new brand and its excellent rates could benefit.

"It's particularly relevant for folks who are close to retirement or are retired, and in particular, who have a certain amount of money to live on," Katchen said. "At the end of the day, they want to make sure that it will be safe."

Since its inception, Oaken Financial has offered consistently better GIC rates than the big banks.

"People might be shocked and horrified if they go to their bank branch and get a five-year GIC today," Katchen said. "The interest rates in your typical branch might be 2 to 2.5 per cent a year.

"I'm not going to say you're going to swing to the moon with our rates, but ours are 50 per cent higher than theirs," Katchen added. "So two per cent [for them] might be three per cent [for us].

> "At the end of the day they want to make sure it will be safe

"It's a low interest rate environment, I can't control that, but we're out there, really trying to find a way for folks to have a stable alternative where they can earn a little bit more on those safe and secure deposits they have."

Oaken Financial is able to offer that security thanks to its parent company, Home Trust, which has had 27 productive years in the business.

"We're a part of Canada's largest independent trust company, and one of the paramount things is that we can reassure customers about the safety of this business," Katchen said.

It's also part of the reason they've branded it as Oaken Financial.

"We wanted a name that was memorable and distinctive, as well as something that tied in well," Katchen said. "Oaken means oak-like, and that's one of the strongest, most solid kinds of wood that exists.

"We wanted to convey the safety and security that is paramount."

And of course, they're part of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, meaning that your money is in safe, regulated hands.

But even with that, the freedom of not being tied to a major bank means that Oaken Financial can do more to help your money grow.

"It allows us to provide a stable alternative, really," Katchen said. "If anyone did a rate comparison among the big five or alternative credit unions, they'd see our rate propositions are very solid.

"Oaken has some of the best GIC rates around, and it's not a teaser rate, it's not a gimmick, it's just what we have."

For more information on Oaken Financial, you can visit their website at www.oaken.com. ■

Household books enlighten readers

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

Advances in the digital age have revolutionized every facet of life; however, sensible household hints and environment-friendly tips remain the same. Whether it's avoiding cross-contamination in the kitchen, taking note of pantry pointers, label lingo, clean air or figuring out a glove size, readers will find concise answers in the following reference guides. Expert Companions Household Skills and Tips: A Guide to Modern Living and Aida Mollenkamp's Keys to the Kitchen: The Essential Reference for becoming a more accomplished, adventurous cook. These instructive, illustrated texts are distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada.

Young couples starting out as well as seasoned homemakers and chefs will discover innovative ways to maintain a fresh, healthy, energy-efficient home. Although surfers can search Google to find facts, it's hard to surpass the convenience of possessing a readily available, enlightening guide.

Expert Companions Household Skills and Tips is a small, well-bound guide focusing on energy saving methods in house cleaning, furnishing and lighting. The editors zero in on the kitchen, the linen closet, laundry care, personal belongings, home décor, pets, and safety in the home. Readers looking for an answer but lacking the patience to pore through text will appreciate the editors' succinct style. The boldface type subject headings and artistic line drawings complement the brief explanations.

Certain topics apply to homes, schools, community centres and offices. Many people like to beautify their premises with indoor plants; although not everyone is aware of the role plants play in purifying the atmosphere. Plants clean the air by absorbing harmful chemicals. The editors name and illustrate plants that require sun, need care, in addition to others that tolerate neglect. The chapter dealing with the "green cleaning kit" offers cost-effective alternatives to heavy-duty commercial products.

Instead of rushing out to buy a strong chemical cleaner to remove rust stains from ceramic tiles, try saturating an absorbent cloth with lemon juice and a few drops of detergent. Lay the cloth on top of the stain for a few hours then rinse. To keep microwave ovens clean and smelling fresh, cook the juice of one lemon in a bowl on high for three to five minutes.

Linen storage principles include "do's and don'ts" such as do add a scented soap to each shelf in the linen closet, the soap will last longer plus the cupboard and linen will emit a pleasant fragrance. Don't use cedar blocks as they tend to yellow and damage delicate linens. People save time using a contour bottom sheet to make a bed but folding fitted sheets takes practice. To speed up the process, turn to page 172 in Household Skills and Tips.

Keys to the Kitchen, the Essential Reference for becoming a more accomplished, adventurous cook is a hard-covered, beautifully bound book. It serves as a great gift for a housewarming or special occasion. Colourful illustrations and informative chapters can be appreciated over time. American author Aida Mollenkamp includes 118 recipes reflecting on various ingredients. However, the recipes are only one component in this multifaceted book, in which Mollenkamp addresses novice and accomplished cooks. What sets this book apart is the extensive information on kitchen management that applies to every autonomous home dweller.

Celebrate the season with elegant and affordable outdoor updates

Patio season is upon us, which means hosting family and friends for warm-weather gatherings and barbecues. Don't fret; outdoor events don't have to break the bank. With just a bit of creative vision and do it yourself savvy, you'll have an al fresco affair to remember in no time at all.

Is your furniture looking a bit battered and worse for wear from too much exposure to the elements? Not to worry. Outdoor-durable spray paint, such as Krylon® ColorMaster Paint + Primer, can revive your wicker or wood seating for many summer seasons to come. It's simple to create sensational seating; just be sure the surface is clean, dull and dry and then spray in one of the 70 colours and finishes that ColorMaster offers. The unique formulation offers quick and easy results – and dries in 10 minutes or less, so you will have more time to stage the rest of your patio arrangement.

Once your seating is set, create eye-catching centrepieces to welcome your guests. No need to head to the store, as items around your home such as forgotten knick-knacks or candlestick holders can easily be spray painted in vibrant colours to complement your newly revitalized furniture. Finish up your tablescape for upcoming dinner parties with colourful cups, place mats and cloth napkins. Your guests will be in awe of your custom designs.

Set the mood at your soirée with interesting accent lighting. Tiki torches are an easy and inexpensive solution to provide excellent perimeter lighting. Or, for a fun project, purchase standard metal lanterns in various sizes at a local craft or hardware store – or even yard sales – and spray paint the exterior in various complementary colours. Finish by adding citronella candles to allow your creation to work double duty to keep pesky mosquitos at bay, ensuring your invited guests don't bolt because of uninvited ones.

Don't settle for lackluster libations – take time to create a festive offering of refreshing seasonal concoctions. In addition to traditional margaritas and daiquiris, try sweetening water with fresh fruits for an invigorating beverage that is perfect for the patio. And for the last detail, make sure you have music. Plug in a favorite playlist or use an app such as Pandora, to keep everyone guessing what will come on next and enjoy a warm summer night.

You don't have to spend much to create an elegant and impressive gathering. By paying attention to small, inexpensive details, you can easily transform a bland backyard, patio or deck into a stylish spot for entertaining that won't leave you penniless at the end of the evening.

Making the move: retirement home shopping

LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

Finding a retirement home for yourself or your parents can be a daunting task, one that's often exacerbated by the stress of the impending downsize and its implications, not to mention frequently conflicting input from friends and family.

Yet when the move becomes a necessity, a clear head is required, so you can act decisively, wisely and according to the right criteria. So what should those criteria be? The CJN asked several retirement communities to weigh in.

"Start with a list of key attributes that are important to you," advises Wendy Teperman, spokesperson for V!VA Thornhill Woods Retirement Community. With that list in place, you're in a better position to compare the pros and cons of one community versus another.

Candice Moller, spokesperson for Four Elms Retirement Residence in Thornhill, says realtors love to talk about the value of a good location, and when you're looking for a retirement residence, "location is crucial. Chances are you want to be close to friends and family, and in a neighbourhood that's familiar to you.

"After your tour, stay for a meal, and while on your tour, stop and ask the residents about their experiences living there," she says.

Teperman says that while you're on your tour, be sure to "do a lot of mental note-taking. Assess the retirement community from the driveway all the way to the suite, checking for cleanliness, staff friendliness and knowledge of the salesperson. Ask residents what they like most and dislike about the community. Observe interaction between residents, and between the culinary team and the residents.

"And review the schedule of activities," she advises. "Is the community active? Are there any activities you would enjoy?"

Leslie Westlake, marketing manager at Hazelton Place Retirement Residence, agrees that location is important.

Resident input is key

"We're just above Hazelton Lanes in Yorkville. We've got all the hospitals near us and the Royal Ontario Museum. At Hazelton, people can choose either independent lifestyle or assisted living, so they don't necessarily have to leave, because we have age-in-place care," Westlake says.

"Everyone that comes looking at a home gets a sense of a place when they walk in, whether or not it's their style. People say ours looks like a cruise ship: warm, friendly, roomy. We have gardens in the back that residents really like. We have visitors parking for friends and family visiting. We have nurses, a family doctor that visits. We're well known for a program called Brain Gym & More, a multi-sensory stimulating exercise program that helps a resident with motivation, mobility, depression. It stimulates the other side of your brain.

"We have a foot doctor who comes in by appointment, and physio three times a week covered by the government. We have a yoga teacher and a bridge facilitator to organize our bridge players. Health and wellness is key – we have 24-hour nursing staff."

When it comes to emergency response, communication and vigilance is key.

"We have a pendant that residents wear that directly calls our nurses, as well as pull cords in the bathroom, and a push button on the wall. We go even beyond that. We check at every meal and make sure people have come down – if not we look into it," Westlake says.

Community input is another key selling point.

"Our food is very good. We have a chef, a pastry maker, a food committee comprised of residents and a residents' general forum that makes them feel like they are part of the decision making. For instance, when we renovated our hallways, we allowed residents to help choose the pattern and colour. We have ongoing meetings with them where they can add their contributions."

Location is big factor in choosing retirement home

Bev Stroll, a spokesperson for Living Life on the Avenue, on Avenue Road, says "there is a very unique crowd we have here, primarily because of the area and the location. That's a big factor in the people that come here. We're at Eglinton Avenue. A lot of the families live in this area, or the residents are from this area. We're looking at Forest Hill, St. Clair, down to Yorkville, in between Lawrence and Bloor. This is the area they're familiar with, that they grew up in. It's an outstanding neighbourhood with a gorgeous combination of residential, and it's steps from downtown Toronto. People tend to stay in the area they're most familiar with, and children want their parents to be closer to them."

"Another large factor when looking to choose a retirement community, is referrals," Stroll says. "People who are enjoying a wonderful life here spread that news to their friends. It's a small Jewish world, and referral is a very large factor. People choose what they know and what they've heard is great. You're looking for people with whom you have common interests or background. With our residents, the majority of them have people, hobbies, activities and business associates in common from the past. It's like a meeting place for people of similar backgrounds.

"The care component is also important. Kids looking for their parents want to know that the care levels can be met so they don't have to move their parents twice. They want to be safe and secure knowing there's adequate nursing care here, that their needs can be met and that if their parents develop more serious ailments, they can be cared for. Here, if someone is in trouble, a nurse is steps away."

Merav Jacobson, manager of marketing at the Terraces of Baycrest Retirement Residence cautions against touring too many residences in one day.

"Given the amount of observation and reflection required on each tour, don't overload your schedule. Rather, limit yourself to a maximum of two tours per day to give yourself time to digest the information and make comparisons without different experiences blending into each other. And if there's a place you really like, don't limit yourself to just one tour," she says.

Amica offers comfort and understated elegance.

"Take a second tour at a different time of day than your first, and arrive early so you can walk around on your own and observe the environment," she adds.

"Does the site look clean and well maintained? Does it smell clean? Is there a bulletin board that lists daily activities for the week, and if so, is there a good range of interesting things to do?"

Forest Hill Place hosts resident welcome lunches, where residents can invite friends who are potential prospects. If those prospects end up moving in for a minimum of three months, the resident gets a referral fee of $1,000. Referrals are important and can be a good way to get a sense of a community's reputation – especially when they're not financially motivated.

"Use your family and friends as a resource and let them help guide you with the questions you should ask," Teperman says.

The reputation of a retirement home is important, but no less important is how you feel while visiting, cautions Moller.

Think ahead to future needs when choosing a home

"Do you feel at home? Is the staff friendly and engaging? And do you think that the person leading your tour understood what you were looking for?"

Marion Hoffman, community relations manager at Amica at Thornhill, advises to look out for the personality of the community you're visiting.

"You want to find a community that's a good fit for you in terms of ambiance, flavour, location, activities, range of offerings and value for price paid," she explains.

Robyn Knezic, general manager for Delmanor Northtown, says Delmanor is "a retirement community. We have multiple religious denominations in our community, so there are opportunities for all of them. At points in time, we've had a rabbi come in and give a talk, and we ensure all the holidays are recognized – Chanukah with menorah lighting, for instance. In my experience, people tend to look for a community that's close by to family or they'll return to an area they may have lived in before, because it's familiar."

"There's no question that every community has its own dynamic. At Delmanor Northtown, we take pride in the way people feel when they're inside our community. They feel very welcomed. They comment all the time that it's such a warm atmosphere – people are so friendly and willing to help."

Moller says the importance of thinking ahead to your potential future needs also can't be underestimated when you're choosing a retirement home. What continuum of care do they provide so that you can age in place?

"Find out if a retirement home has assisted living facilities, and registered nurses on duty who can deal with medications, injections, incontinence and dementia," Moller suggests.

"Do they have a visiting physician? Do they have a secure floor if a resident starts to wander? These may not be issues you are wrestling with today, but no one knows what the future holds, and it's always good to know your home of choice has options available, so another move years or months later won't be necessary," she says.

"Choose a residence that can meet your needs as they change, so you won't have to move again at the worst possible time," Moller adds.

Kensington Place is a heimish community that's unique and elegant.

Find out about the staff-to-resident ratio, and don't be afraid to clarify the meaning of 24-hour staffing. Does it mean round-the-clock nursing care?

At the Terraces of Baycrest, there are several on-site health professionals, including six doctors, a psychiatrist, nurses, occupational therapist, a pharmacist, kinesiologists and a foot care specialist.

"We're able to refer to specialists at Baycrest Hospital, located on the same campus as the retirement residence," Jacobson says.

"Find out what kind of hospitalization prevention strategies are employed, if the on-site doctors are taking on new clients, and if they are, what their weekly hours in the residence are."

If Judaism is religiously, traditionally or culturally important to you, find out if the home is a good cultural match, Jacobson advises. Does it offer kosher food, women-only exercise programs and a synagogue on site? Are there programs and supports in place for Holocaust survivors?

Mira Anidjar of Kensington Place says that "in our case, it's the atmosphere you're looking for. Our community is very unique. There's a lot of Yiddishkeit.

Recycle your old and obsolete electronics for multiple benefits

> It's impossible to imagine a world where piles of old electronics are sitting in landfills, harming our environment

NEWS CANADA

Canadians are certainly faithful to separating their household garbage all week long, indicating that most of us are determined to pull our weight when it comes to protecting the environment. A growing number of Canadians, however, have added another step.

For several years now, a robust nationwide initiative has made it much easier and safer to recycle our end-of-life electronics.

All recycling is beneficial, but when it comes to safely discarding electronic items like laptops, televisions, printers, and cameras, there are far more rewards in store than first meet the eye, says the Electronic Products Recycling Association (EPRA), an industry-led, not-for-profit organization that operates and regulates recycling programs across the country.

"When you recycle end-of-life electronic products in a safe and secure manner, you're not only helping to keep them out of Canada's landfill, you are also preventing them from being illegally exported or handled by irresponsible recyclers," says Cliff Hacking, the president and chief executive officer for EPRA.

"Furthermore, when electronics are received and dismantled by approved recyclers, you are also helping to recover and recycle valuable resources that can be put back into the manufacturing supply chain."

Today, there are well over 1,000 authorized EPRA collection sites in the country, including official drop-off centres, plus return-to-retail locations, special recycling events – and as a result, many Canadians are doing their part. Collection records show that already as much as 100,000 metric tons of old electronics are kept out of landfills every year – and that is roughly the weight equivalent of 20,000 elephants.

So what happens to all those electronic products instead?

Once received by an authorized collection site, the items are sent to audited and approved recyclers for specialized processing. New technology is used to break down old technology and to harvest the raw materials that went into them, including glass, plastic, and precious metals like gold and copper.

Substances of concern like mercury and lead are disposed of responsibly to protect both the environment and the health and safety of the workers handling them. The recovered materials are then put back into the manufacturers' supply chain and used to make new products.

It's impossible to imagine the world today without electronics. But, says EPRA, we must also make sure that it's impossible to imagine a world where piles of old electronics are sitting in landfills, harming our environment.

As many as 80 per cent of Canadians polled said they had at least one end-of-life electronic item in the house. Do you?

If so, more information about recycling them responsibly – including an informative video– is available online at www.recycleMYelectronics.ca. ■

Rely on your gut instinct

The people that live here mostly share a common background. Most of them are Holocaust survivors.

"When they come here, there's a feeling like they're back home, there's a familiar home-like feeling and people feel a common bond of the old country. It's a very unique community here. There's also the kosher aspect that draws people to our building. It'ws attractive to either themselves or their children's way of life. With kosher comes a feel of Jewishness, customs and even if you're not religious, if your kids are, then they will be comfortable coming to eat with you here," Anidjar says.

"The beauty of the building is also a plus – it's beautiful but not posh, warm but inviting, a very elegant atmosphere. Along with that comes the special foods we have. It's like what you served your family at home. Most of these women were incredible homemakers, so their pride is reflected in the cooking here.

"All of that connects. Our programming is very focused on residents' backgrounds, too. We have a Yiddish club, our own choir, bubbe's bistro, bakers' corner challah baking, crafters' corner, knitters nook, exercise, and relaxation yoga."

Many activities are within walking distance of Four Elms.

Living Life on the Avenue is steps from downtown.

At the end of the day, though, when it comes down to making the big decision, rely on your gut instincts, says Lisa Hunter, lifestyle consultant at Forest Hill Place.

"We know that when a prospect comes in through our doors, they will either love our community or they won't," she says.

That instinctive feeling and the little voice in your head should never be quieted or ignored. But if you're second-guessing yourself and still unsure, it's okay to ask for a trial stay, says Jacobson, from the Terraces.

"It's a way to learn even more about the facility, get a feel for the atmosphere and rhythms of the place and have the peace of mind that you can still return to your home if the facility is not the right fit for you," she says.

At Canterbury Place, sunshine streaming through the windows will welcome you and invokes a sense of warmth, whether you're relaxing in the comfort of your suite or enjoying a game of cards with friends, says representative Janet Crawford.

"Experience our chefs prepared home cooking or invite the family for your own personal summer barbecue on the terrace. Stay home and be entertained so you can get to know your neighbours," she says.

"Your family will feel comfortable the moment they enter the bar and share a cappuccino with you while watching a ball game on the big screen." ■

Patio, tree establish blissful co-existence

CJN STAFF

Some time after my wife and I purchased our home, we discovered that the patio on the northeast corner of the house had been laid directly on the sprawling root system of a massive Norway spruce tree, some 50 feet high and eight feet in girth. The result? Wholesale upheaval and undulation, culminating in a six-inch "peak," where the tree's foot-thick primary anchor root had lifted the 65-pound concrete patio slabs resting on it like so much dandelion fluff.

The solution? Remove the slabs, raise the entire patio by an average of four inches of new sand – graded from a one-inch increment at the south end to a seven-inch increment at the north end abutting the tree – and rebuild with random flagstone. The alternative – cutting into the beautiful root system that had predated our arrival by more than half a century – was not an option in our books.

At the same time, we also had to excavate and build a connecting walkway, plant a strip of violets between it and the garage, and rebuild the crumbling rear garage door sill, patio perimeter base and patio roof support posts, which on close inspection we discovered were quite literally hanging by — actually, sitting on — a thread.

After countless summer mornings, evenings and weekends of lifting, schlepping, digging, pickaxing, raking, measuring, mixing, setting, drilling, sawing, hammering, nailing, screwing, stapling, cutting, chopping, chiselling, compacting, cursing, and generally eating dust, I was really starting to get the hang of walkway and patio building.

Along the way, I encountered a myriad of impediments that I hadn't envisioned at the outset. To cite but one, I had to hand-chisel several deep notches in the four by fours anchoring the new perimeter base to allow them to nestle snugly over the roots they encountered. At the same time, the upper surface of these four by fours had to follow the north-south and east-west slopes of the new patio surface. This was necessary both for esthetics and to allow water to drain away from the house.

> There were a myriad of impediments that I hadn't envisioned at the outset

The trials and tribulations of the undertaking could fill a book. Here are the broad strokes:

Window treatments set the mood of your home

NEWS CANADA

When you walk into any room in your home, what's the first thing you notice? Is it the couch? Or your new side table from that antique shop you bought last week?

It could be. What is often overlooked, however, is that the overall ambience sets the tone for how you feel, more so than select decorative items. And what directly affects that mood might surprise you: "More often than not, it's the lighting," says Kim Kiner, the vice-president of product design at Hunter Douglas, a leading window treatments manufacturer.

"Whether it's soft, filtered light or bright sunshine cascading through your shades, the way light enters a room can change everything," she says. With so much at stake at the window, Kiner gives us these popular trends to get the most out of your window dressings:

Motorization: Consumers today want a "connected home" with Internet-ready products that can be operated with the convenience of mobile devices, Kiner points out. "Hunter Douglas has a Platinum App, for example, which allows users to create personalized scenes from morning light to movie night. You can control all the shades in your home with one click," she says. "Time a scene with your alarm clock for a refreshing morning." The app will soon be available for Android as well as Apple mobile devices and is also offered with a sunrise/sunset timer feature that uses GPS data to calculate location-specific times.

The company's custom-crafted Design Studio Roman shades can be operated with the app too, as they have added a battery-powered motorization option.

Energy efficiency: Everyone wants to live more responsibly. Products that offer enhanced energy efficiency to keep homes cooler in the summer and warmer in the winter are very popular. "Energy-efficient window treatments are a smart way to conserve energy in your home," says Kiner. Duette Architella honeycomb shades, for example, can help reduce solar heat gain through windows by up to 80 per cent, while also helping to reduce heat loss by up to 40 per cent. The enhanced UV protection offered by soft, sheer Silhouette window shadings is trending with consumers as well.

Sophisticated textures: Window coverings today are not just about function: they make a style statement. And consumers love the beauty and sophistication that textures add at the window. From natural textures to exquisite textile weaves, such as linens and raw silks, they create a distinctive look that transforms an ordinary window to extraordinary. This spring's Silhouette shadings collection offers textured fabric vanes and sheers that beautifully enhance light at the window.

Whether you're living in a new space and starting from scratch or want to update your window décor, these trends will modernize your home and add unique style. ■

Shower seats can add to your comfort and safety

Step 3: Stretch Your Space

If you're feeling a bit claustrophobic in the shower, it may be time for an update. But don't think adding additional shower space means adding a lot of cost. You can easily add additional elbow room by simply swapping your straight shower curtain rod with a curved shower rod.

Take a look at the easy installation of the Tension Curved Shower Rod. Details at moen.ca.

Step 4: Take a Seat

Would you be more relaxed (and feel more secure while shaving your legs, or washing your feet) if you had a nice place to sit? If your current shower doesn't have built-in seating, there is a wide range of options, from freestanding chairs to more upscale fold-down shower seats featuring teak and stainless finishes. But no matter which you choose, you'll soon see that serenity in the shower feels safer in a seated position.

Step 5: Slip and Slide

It's inevitable in the bath – water is going to create slick surfaces. So, before you step in and shower, be sure that you won't fall flat. For less than the cost of a cup of coffee, you can install treads to the bottom of your shower for some sure footing and added traction.

Step 6: Grab a Towel

Once you're squeaky clean and relaxed, you'll want to reach out for a fluffy, warm towel and climb out of the shower. How can you ensure your towels are close at hand? Install a towel bar just outside the shower area. But don't choose just any towel bar – add extra safety with a towel bar that incorporates a grab bar.

"Our research shows that the most challenging and potentially dangerous bathroom activity is getting in and out of the bathtub or shower safely," says Jack Suvak, senior director of market research and insights at Moen. "And, many bathers rely on items such as towel bars or shower door handles, which are not built to hold a person's weight. Our grab bars and towel bars are designed to deliver that kind of security." ■

Pull-out shelves for any room in the house

Not only do pull-out shelves help de-clutter your home and save you space, they also make it much easier for you to find things you're constantly looking for – you won't need to get down on your hands and knees to reach things stuck at the back of your cabinet or get on a chair to find an item high up in your pantry, she said.

"People have one too many cans dropped on their feet or they broke too many dishes or can't find something in their cabinets, they see the value of the gliding shelves."

The drawers are fully extendable, allowing you to pull them out completely and access everything.

While the pull-out shelves are very popular for kitchens, they can be added to any space such as bathroom cabinets or linen closets, said Keselman.

Some popular items are tray boxes with dividers so nothing falls when you pull it out, and the hidden corner pull-out shelves which maximize space in the back corner of your cabinets.

The product starts at $135 per drawer including installation and the price varies based on the width and size of your cabinets. The shelves can carry 150 pounds when fully extended and come with a lifetime warranty.

Gliding Shelf Solutions also provides a free in-home thorough consultation. "It's a really good consultation. I don't just come to see how many glides you want. I go through the kitchen, I see how the space works for you, I make suggestions, I measure the cabinets," said Keselman. "From the time you place an order to installation, it's roughly three to four weeks."

Their products also qualify for the Healthy Homes Renovation tax credit, which gives seniors up to $1,500 rebate with their income tax.

The products are made in Canada, manufactured in Ontario, custom made to your unique measurements. "They increase space, force you to stay organized, and increase safety too," said Keselman. "They're suitable for every home." ■

Patio is well worth the effort

BUYING: Countless trips to building supply stores for all the tools, materials and fasteners I thought I'd require and many I never dreamed I'd need.

STAKING AND GRIDDING: A network of some 20 layout lines was required to establish the proper north-south and east-west slopes. Ensuring consistency across the entire network covering one continuous surface – the patio and the connecting walkway — proved particularly tricky. Throughout the process, I repeatedly moved, restaked, adjusted and tweaked the layout lines to ensure this consistency.

DIGGING: Excavating 150 square feet of walkway to a depth of eight inches and digging out the patio's perimeter in order to rebuild its foundation.

SHLEPPING: Four cubic yards of moisture-laden clay soil and six cubic yards of sand are a lot to shovel and wheelbarrow around a property. Prying up, lifting and carrying the 72 original 65-pound concrete slabs was child's play by comparison. All in all, I moved some 15 tons of material – portions of it multiple times as dictated by space constraints, learning on the job, and simple lack of foresight.

CUTTING AND NOTCHING: Good cedar four by fours for the perimeter base; scrap two by fours and one by fours for spacers to keep the two-by-eight composite walkway borders exactly two feet apart both top and bottom before laying the sand base between them; and good one by fours to finish the patio perimeter base.

LAYING: 450 square feet of landscape fabric, tacked in place with six-inch plastic spikes and stapled to the walkway borders and patio perimeter base.

LEVELLING, PLUMBING AND SUPPORTING: By means both conventional (box and line levels) and unorthodox (the iron bars used to keep the walkway borders plumb until I could buttress them on the outside with hard-packed clay soil).

PAINTING: Three coats – high-gloss paint for the white portion of the new perimeter base, sealant for the natural red portion.

GRADING: Once the layout lines were in place, the sand had to be raked and compacted to match their level and slope.

All of the foregoing took me to the end of October, at which point I decided to hire a stonemason to ensure that the job would be completed before winter. That gentleman was most helpful in selecting the stone, which he agreed to lay and set at a good price based on the entire base being graded and ready for laying, so that no additional work would be required on his part.

Throughout the process, our magnificent spruce loomed over the proceedings like a giant mastodon prepared to scuttle, with a flick of its big toe, my efforts at the slightest sign of further encroachment. But it was also benevolent, allowing me to use its farthest-reaching broad root as a natural border for the walkway and lead-in to the patio. For its part, the variety of random flagstone my wife chose has lived up to its name ("Rainbow") by showing its full colour when wet, ensuring sunny spirits come fair weather or foul. ■

One great city for Jewish immigration?

An article that ran in major Israeli news outlets suggested that Winnipeg's effort to grow its Jewish population has caused more problems than it solved. BERNIE BELLAN PHOTO

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

WINNIPEG — "I believe that there is no such thing as bad publicity," says Winnipeg Jewish Federation executive director Bob Freedman, responding to an article by JTA reporter Uriel Heilman that appeared in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz and on the Times of Israel website, among other places.

The article suggests that the vaunted GrowWinnipeg 15-year-old initiative to increase the size of the city's formerly dwindling Jewish population by attracting South American immigrants fleeing economic instability in their homelands has caused more problems than it's solved.

Over the last 15 years, the majority of immigrants to Winnipeg have come initially from South America, and then from Israel. The story says that while the South American Jewish families were a good fit for the Winnipeg Jewish community, this was not as true for the Israelis.

But has that in fact been the case? Opinion in the city is mixed.

Nevertheless, as a result of the widespread attention the story has received internationally, Freedman said the federation office and website are being "bombarded" with calls and emails from Jews throughout North America and Europe who are suddenly considering Winnipeg as a potential new home.

On the other hand, he noted, some of the more than 4,400 Jewish newcomers to Winnipeg in recent years were "upset and offended" by Heilman's article.

"I'm not sure where Heilman got the impression that our immigration recruitment program has backfired on us," Freedman said, referring to the headline on the piece when it ran on Haaretz.com. "I thought that the tone of the article was too negative," said Faye Rosenberg Cohen, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's planning director. "The Jewish immigrants who have come here in the last 15 years have been of great benefit to our community."

Grey's Anatomy features Israeli know-how, and Shoah essay rankles

Heart tech breakthrough

Viewers of ABC's Grey's Anatomy – yes, it's still on the air – may have thought they were watching some sci-fi fantasy earlier this month when Dr. Preston Burke, old flame and former mentor of Dr. Cristina Yang, played by Canadian Sandra Oh, showed her a 3-D hologram of a heart and began flipping it around without special glasses or equipment. It turns out they were seeing an actual tech breakthrough from RealView Imaging, an Israeli company based in the small northern town of Yokneam. The technology makes it possible for surgeons to virtually plan delicate procedures.

Hologram technology lets surgeons manipulate your virtual heart.

Yom Ha'atzmaut, Hamas-style

In honour of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Hamas released a YouTube video with a cover of the Israeli national anthem Hatikvah (The Hope). Titled Sof Hatikvah (The End Of Hope) and sung entirely in rhyming Hebrew, the video promises Israelis they will soon be driven out of the land of Israel. "The army of the Zionists was built of wax and now it is melted and has no hope," the singer croons as a computer generated character smashes Israel's state symbols into rubble. The song says smart Israelis will be allowed to leave the country and return "to their homelands" while those who are stubborn and remain will have their fates "sealed beneath the dirt." And who said Hamas is only about terror?

Apology for Holocaust assignment

Whether the Holocaust happened is no longer up for debate at California's Rialto Unified School District. Some 2,000 eighth-graders in the Los Angeles-area district were told to write an essay explaining whether they believed the Holocaust was a real historical event or a political scheme to influence public emotion and gain. Board officials apologized last week after protests by several groups, including the Anti-Defamation League. "It was an error," board spokeswoman Syeda Jafri said May 5. Students finished the work in February. ■

Letters to the Editor

Hello from Halifax

I would like to thank Ralph and Shirlee Medjuck and the Atlantic Jewish Council for arranging subscriptions for Atlantic Canada. It's so great to feel plugged into the rest of Jewish Canada and to see some content from our neck of the woods. The content is fresh and interesting and there is always something great to read. Thanks!

Breaking the silence

It felt very gratifying to light the sixth candle in honour of the gay and disabled victims of the Holocaust at the Yom Hashoah Community Commemoration in Toronto.

For many years, the gay experience in the Holocaust was characterized in German as Totgeschlagen, totgeschwiegen (beaten to death, silenced). Today, that silence is being broken, and Kulanu Toronto is proud that Toronto is helping to break that silence. It is our community's duty to remember all those who perished in the Holocaust, including those who were branded by the pink triangle.

In defence of Yiddish

The word vinkl in Yiddish means corner. It breaks my heart to think that the new CJN doesn't have a corner for Yiddish speakers and readers, most of whom are CJN subscribers. And you've canned Hebrew, too.

So, in exiling Yiddish and Hebrew from your pages, you are exiling the base of modern Jewish identity in order to gain what? Will it strengthen the belonging of the young and slow down their assimilation?

Some may say that as a former writer for The CJN who has been left in the vinkl, my comments may be sour grapes. I hope that is not so. The CJN has the marvellous opportunity of reaching out to the many cultural and religious voices that exist in Canadian Jewry – and grabbing the younger audience in all its variety. Showing that different Jewish voices can peacefully play in the same sandbox is one way of helping our young people stay with us.

I think we all have to remember that as a community we are part of a goldene keyt, a golden chain of culture that links past to present religiously, and secularly. The strength in the chain is in the tension of both parts of our Jewish expression.

Rethinking BDS protest

Thank you for publishing my letter ("BDS: A prof's response," The CJN, April 24).

I think some clarification is needed though. The more I thought about the issue the more I realized that "working to rule" could also punish those who do not support the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

I have come up with a more targeted approach, and one that is currently being considered by an international professional academic body. I have decided to place a sign on my door, and am urging like-minded academics to do the same, where the sign clarifies my affiliation with Tel Aviv University and for supporters of the BDS campaign to take note of my affiliation. I go on to state that they can take whatever action they deem appropriate, meaning that they can turn around and not work with me (i.e. boycott me) or perhaps rethink their support of the BDS campaign and continue to work with me.

This will target BDS supporters while not affecting those who are against the BDS campaign or otherwise just do not support BDS campaigns on campus.

I hope that this idea catches on. Even those who might not be affiliated directly with an Israeli university or organization can indicate that they might collaborate with such groups or individual professors, or that their offices are "BDS-Free Zones."

Looking for S. Pasternak

A friend from Poland asked me to find Szymon Pasternak, who was saved during World War II by his neighbour.

The last letter that was received from Mr. Pasternak came in 1989 from 556 Coldstream Ave., Toronto.

The previous family name of Pasternak was Czarnaczapka, and he lived in Kosemino and then moved to Siemitkowo.

Please help me to find the person, if he is still alive, or his relatives.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Shul kiddush is about more than food

Some synagogues see it as a key way to fulfil their mission of providing outlets for holy encounters

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Cutler: At any given time, I am blessed with mentoring about 10 individuals in the process of converting to Judaism. When reviewing our Shabbat services, I tell them when shul begins and ends. Like most of our congregants, I don't expect them to leave the building once Adon Olam is concluded. In fact, I stress that if they want to be Jewish, they have to stay for kiddush.

There is, of course, no Jewish legal reason for a person to eat babka and pasta salad (we have a pretty decent kiddush at Beth Tzedec) in order to convert to Judaism. Rather, in the socializing that occurs, I see an important transformation take place: the move from outsider to insider. At kiddush, I see the establishment of Jewish peoplehood.

Rabbi Scheier: Our kiddushes at the Shaar are famous. Party sandwiches, egg rolls, the occasional cholent, Israeli salad, eggs, noodles, special kid-friendly fare.

But more than the food, it's the conversations that intrigue me. Groups of congregants sit around for hours at kiddush discussing all kinds of topics (including the sermon). If our synagogue's mission is to provide an outlet for holy encounters, then kiddush is one of those times when our mission is realized. I believe that in terms of community-building, Shabbat kiddush is one of our synagogue's most important programs.

Also of interest to me are those individuals we call JFKs – those who arrive "just for kiddush." If we can see kiddush as a program of its own merit, then we shouldn't mind that people show up for that program and are absent from the Shabbat service that precedes it.

Rabbi Cutler: Thank you for adding another Jewish acronym to my vocabulary. Based on your menu alone, I'm not surprised about how many JFKs your shul attracts.

If kiddush has value in and of itself (and I think we both agree that it does), then just as we invite people to come to shul for monthly meditation, we should equally tell people that they are welcome to attend our weekly kiddush – even if that's the only "program" they are attending at shul.

Of course, all of this comes with a cost. Two synagogues – one in the Hamptons, the other in Bal Harbor, Fla., – made the news last year for extravagant kiddushes, with each shul reportedly spending $10,000 per week. Where's the line? How do we measure impact?

Rabbi Scheier: I believe that the investment a congregation makes in its kiddush should correspond to the degree to which it sees kiddush as part of its core mission. Is it a kiddush that takes nutritional value into account, accommodating those who, out of financial need, look to our kiddush as a primary source of sustenance? Is it a kiddush that provides youth-friendly fare to encourage children and young families to attend and thereby deepen their connection to community? Is it a kiddush that offers study opportunities and programming to enrich the spiritual value of the time spent at kiddush? If a congregation can truly view kiddush as part of its core mission, then a significant investment in kiddush is justified (and even encouraged).

Rabbi Cutler: Your kiddush descriptions and what I've experienced first hand at other Montreal shuls are beginning to make me reconsider my hockey allegiances and perhaps get on the Canadiens bandwagon.

Kiddush can be very good at catching up with friends. I worry, though, about those who are new to our communities. While as the rabbi I am happy to float from table to table, saying hello to the regulars and introducing myself to new faces, for those who are unfamiliar with the synagogue, kiddush can be a very intimidating event.

What mechanisms can we add to kiddush, without being awkward or overly contrived, that will enable newcomers to feel more welcomed?

Rabbi Scheier: The answer hinges on our ability to treat kiddush as a program of engagement. We – clergy and lay leadership – must take our responsibility as "hosts" of the kiddush very seriously. Of course, this responsibility extends to the quality of the food, kiddush programming content, and any other efforts that will affect the overall mood in the room. What a lofty purpose for tables of kichel, herring, and cholent. ■

SeeJN | Bible contest winner

A Canadian high school student was the winner of the annual International Bible Contest in Jerusalem. Eitan Amos, 18, a student at Yeshivat Or Chaim in Toronto, pictured with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, centre, and Education Minister Shai Piron, won first place in the contest, held every year in Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut. Amos reportedly is the first Canadian to win first place in the contest since Leiby Warner did so in 1974 at age 14.

Our aim in a word: balance

The Rob Ford allegations that emerged Friday night affirmed the Toronto mayor's shocking narrative of descent in many of the usual ways: reports of heavy drinking, drug use, driving while intoxicated, ranting and raving are, sadly, nothing new for Ford. What was new this time was that Ford allegedly aimed his venom at Jews.

According to the Toronto Star, Ford told someone on the other end of a cellphone "Nobody sticks up for people like I do, every f---ing ki-e, ni--er, f---ing w-p, d-go, whatever the race. Nobody does." Then, in case the listener didn't glean the mayor's message from his first, discombobulated attempt: "I'm the most racist guy around." And finally, an affirmation many wish wasn't true: "I'm the mayor of Toronto."

Ford's statement speaks for itself and, if it's true, then no excuse or explanation can make it go away. It's hard to see how he might re-ingratiate himself to the Jewish, black, Italian and Spanish communities in Toronto he so viciously disparaged with the derogatory remarks reportedly caught on tape.

The mayor's supporters – some of whom would more accurately be described as enablers – will reply, again, that booze and drugs, and the media, are to blame, not Ford himself. Some – even in the communities he attacked – will repeat the mayor's popular "standing up for the little guy" talking point, even though this particular rant brazenly contradicts it.

Unlikely as it may seem, Rob Ford's latest stumble offers an opportunity for us to discuss a Canadian Jewish News-related issue – namely, how we cover politics and elections.

Over the last few months as this newspaper has reinvented itself, one of the primary objectives has been, in a word, balance. It's not an exact science – there's no mathematical formula – but we try our best to frame the news and community issues we cover from all points of view equally – right, left, Conservative, Liberal, NDP, Green and everywhere in between. (How The CJN approaches Israeli politics is a topic for another day.)

The point is to share ideas and opinions, not tell you how to think or which way to vote. As the independent voice of Canada's Jewish community, we believe our job is to broadcast the wide variety of opinions and perspectives Canadian Jews hold. It's one of the reasons why, for example, we ended the practice of publishing unsigned editorials. The notion that there is one particular Canadian Jewish stance on just about any matter is, frankly, ridiculous.

Most newspapers, now as ever, have defined political positions, and that can engender a type of tunnel vision. Add to that the political conversation online, and if you only ever wanted to read things you would agree with, you'd have more than enough to choose from.

But the breadth of Canadian Jewry affords The CJN a unique opportunity to do quite the opposite – to act as a communal space for the exchange of ideas, opinions, beliefs. That's our aim, and the fact we've received complaints so far that we're too right-wing and too left-wing suggests we might just be on the way to achieving the impartial equilibrium we're after. — YONI

The challenge of My Promised Land

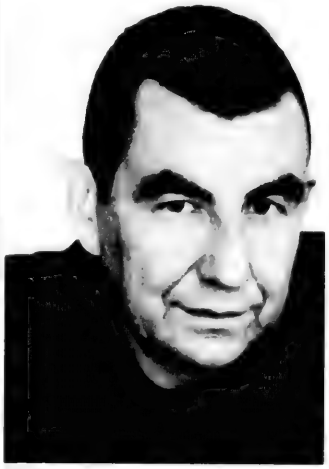
Martin Goldfarb

The book My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel, by Ari Shavit, left me feeling pessimistic and discombobulated about the future of Israel as a home for the Jewish People and as the key source for the evolution of Jewish thinking. I know that my reaction differs from many who praise this book. However, I believe in the importance of optimism. Optimism is planned behaviour, and true optimism is a result of confidence and preparation. The challenge for me is that Shavit's thesis seems to preclude optimism.

This book is premised on Jewish self-guilt regarding the Palestinians and Israeli Arabs. In this context, it encourages Israel to take risks, regardless of the consequences. But the fact is that the Palestinians have never accepted the reality that the Jewish People have a long heritage in the Land of Israel, and by accepting this Palestinian perspective on history, the book prescribes an outcome that will likely have negative consequences for Jewish survival in Israel.

Shavit asserts that Israel is a western country. I'm not so sure that it is. It tries to think western, but geographically it's not western, and geography often dictates national character. It is a Middle Eastern state geographically, with some western cultural attributes. Israel cannot function as if it doesn't exist in the Middle East. I believe that if peace happens, Israel will accommodate its way of doing things to the geography it inhabits. It is unlikely that Israel can change the Middle East. Over time, the character of Israel's thinking will inevitably become more like its neighbours.

Palestinians need to come to grips with this reality: they can no longer expect Israel to act like a western nation, and yet act themselves in accordance with Middle Eastern attitudes and behaviours toward Israel. Choices have consequences.



Ari Shavit

> The book inaccurately singles out Israel as an occcupier nation when its behaviour is really no different than that of other nations all over the world

The book inaccurately singles out Israel as an occupier nation when its behaviour is really no different than that of other nations all over the world. All nations, including western nations, have done what is necessary for survival and development. Francis Fukuyama, in his book The Origins of Political Order, documents this brilliantly – he shows that subjugation and conquest have been part of nation-building in the United Kingdom, Europe, China, India and the Islamic world. Somehow Shavit wants to believe that Israel can maintain a strong nation-state following a different paradigm.

Democracy in Israel is the same as democracy in other countries. Sometimes it protects itself through tough decisions. Democracy, at its best, understands and prioritizes survival. For example, the 1948 expulsion of Palestinians from Lydda was a calculated military decision to help ensure the survival of Israel as a country. Yes, people suffered, and I have sympathy for them as individuals, but I don't hold the leaders who made that decision at fault. They were at war. They did what they thought needed to be done.

Collective wisdom in a democracy must be trusted. Shavit denigrates the decisions that Israeli leaders have taken to create and ensure the survival of the Jewish state. Seven decades of Israeli leaders have risen to the challenges they faced, not without difficulty or frustration, but with perseverance. They, like leaders of other nations, have done what is necessary for survival and development, and Israeli citizens have shown support for this approach through the democratic process.

There is a right to a Jewish state – that is why Zionism survives. The formation of the State of Israel changed Jewish thinking of self-doubt, self-denial and subjugation to others. The genius of Zionism was to understand that change can be a self-fulfilling prophesy and that implementation was and is necessary for survival. Zionism enabled optimism. It prepared Jews for survival in the Middle East and gave them confidence in themselves. It still does today.

My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel suggests that Zionism, in fact, could collapse and that the land could become an Arab land where Jews may or may not be welcome. The trouble for me is that if they are not welcomed by Arab leaders, what then? Leave it to chance?

The survival of Israel as a Jewish state cannot be negotiable. It is a given. The reality of a Jewish nation-state must be understood in any future negotiations with the Palestinians. For a successful negotiated peace, Palestinians must accept the right of Israel to exist. Without this, conversation is difficult. Israel and the Jewish People have too much at risk.

I admire Ari Shavit's ability to tell an engaging story. The problem is that this story is not without consequences. His thesis would sap the confidence and optimism of the Israeli people. It would deny them the ability and right to defend their heritage, territory, culture, religion and language. ■

Article stirs debate about GrowWinnipeg

Winnipeg's Jewish community goes back to 1882, when the first sizeable group of Russian Jews arrived. As in other North American cities, the community grew a lot in the years leading up to and after World War I. And while it has often been difficult to keep people, the steady outflow of people was more than compensated for by an influx of Holocaust survivors after the war and a steady stream of Jewish families from rural communities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and northwestern Ontario throughout the 1940s and into the 1960s.

The community's population peaked at 21,000 in 1961, then began an inexorable decline. By the mid-1960s, there were few Jewish families left in rural areas to replenish Winnipeg's Jewish population. By 1990, it had fallen to less than 16,000 and was aging. In the mid-1990s, Freedman and other community leaders began taking action to reverse the trend.

The first step was the construction of the Asper Jewish Community Campus in south Winnipeg, originally built to replace the old YMHA downtown. One of the first such community campuses in North America, the Asper Campus includes a JCC, the kindergarten-to-Grade-12 Gray Academy of Jewish Education, a Jewish library and Jewish communal offices.

The Asper Campus opened in 1997, and the GrowWinnipeg initiative followed shortly thereafter in an effort to retain younger people who grew up here, as well as persuade former Winnipeggers to come back and recruit new Jewish immigrants.

Key to the recruitment program was outreach to Jewish communities of Latin America – and especially Argentina – which happened largely due to a coincidence. In 1998, Janice Filmon, wife of then-Manitoba premier Gary Filmon, happened to be sitting next to a Jewish Argentine on a flight. At the time, Argentina was undergoing an economic meltdown, and Manitoba had an immigration agreement with Ottawa that allowed the province to recruit skilled immigrants.

As a result of Filmon's initiative, the Jewish federation organized a program to recruit South American Jews. It included visits to the region by federation representatives, a website and a welcoming committee for Jews coming for exploratory visits and later taking up residence.

Over the next few years, some 500 South American Jewish families moved to Winnipeg and were wholeheartedly welcomed. Then, around 2005, South American immigration largely stopped (a small number still arrive each year) as the Argentine economy improved. Unexpectedly, though, a large influx of Israelis, mostly originating from the former Soviet Union, began arriving – some 1,000 families over the past nine years.

Freedman is adamant the federation has never actively promoted Israeli immigration to Winnipeg. "The details about our programs and eligibility rules are online," he said. "Anybody can access them."

The Jewish community's support agencies help all Jewish immigrants, no matter where they come from, he added.

So were the South Americans a better fit than the Israelis, as the article suggests?

Arie Lavy is an Israeli who has been living in Winnipeg for about 30 years. He believes the South Americans were a better fit, because they came from established Jewish communities, much like Winnipeg's, and understand that you have to pay to support your community.

For the Israelis, it's different, he said. "In Israel, no one pays to belong to a shul or go to school. It's a different mentality. They don't feel the need to belong to a Jewish community because that was not an issue in Israel."

The city's Lubavitch Centre does attract Israeli families for yom tov programs, Lavy noted, because they're free and no membership is required, but he believes the Israelis also see Lubavitch as authentic Judaism, because there are very few Conservative and Reform shuls in Israel.

Lavy suggested the language barrier is also more of an issue for the Israelis. He urges the federation and other Jewish groups to put out material in Hebrew and/or Russian if they want to attract more immigrants to their programs.

Bernie Bellan, owner, publisher and editor of Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News, argues Russians and Israelis have come mainly to improve their economic situation and don't really care much about being part of the Jewish community.

On the other hand, Rory Paul, Gray Academy's CEO and head of school, said the influx of newcomers has stabilized the school's student population and increased it. He said 80 of its 550 students have been in Winnipeg for three years or less.

"All the new children here have added immeasurably to the culture and life of our school," he said. "It has been a wonderful opportunity for our children to be exposed to so many different cultures."

Bellan is trying to find out how many immigrants who have come here in the last 15 years have stayed. Federation's Rosenberg Cohen said her staff are still working on those numbers, but said immigrants have made their presence strongly felt.

Paul, however, said that last year, 30 Gray students and their families left the school and the city. "After four or five years here, some of the immigrants have moved into middle management in their workplaces," he said. "If they want to better their careers, some of them have to look elsewhere. You can't fault them for that."

The cost to the community of absorbing the immigrants has also raised questions. One estimate puts the yearly cost of immigrant services at $500,000. Rosenberg Cohen agreed that the amount is substantial, but while she doesn't have a total dollar figure, she said $500,000 sounds too high.

"We are not sure where that figure came from," she said. "And relative to the long-term benefits, the cost is actually quite modest."

Because Gray Academy charges tuition on a sliding scale based on family income, Paul noted, more immigrants – who initially have little or no income – do have a negative effect on its bottom line.

Bellan praised Heilman's article for "fomenting discussion about immigration."

And Bob Freedman noted that after a 30-year decline, the Jewish community is growing again. "We have had people come here who are actively participating in our community and whose kids are attending our school, our camps and our youth groups," he said. "That doesn't sound to me like a failing program." ■

Get lost when you are in Israel

Gil Troy

Nearly 600 Montrealers are visiting Israel on a mega-mission this May. The delegation's size and quality reflect the central role Montreal's Federation CJA plays in the community's life.

Just as the eastern European kehillah kept the Jewish People together for centuries with independent, enveloping, communal institutions, the federation serves as the central address for Montreal Jewry (and most Canadian communities), helping the needy, educating the young and protecting the community, while standing with and for Israel. The organizers have done an extraordinary job of planning an impressive itinerary. The people of Israel are ready to host them. Still, the best advice I can give to my friends on the delegation is: "Get lost!"

I say, "Get lost" in two meanings of the phrase, but not a third. No, I am not being ungracious and saying, New York-style, "Get outta here." But I am suggesting that each visitor – on this mission and all others – carve out some private time, break away from the group, turn off the Waze or Google Maps, and wander.

"Get lost" in the Old City of Jerusalem's alleyways, and see how ancient and modern harmonize together in the Jewish People's eternal capital. "Get lost" around Machane Yehuda and absorb the sights, sounds and smells of the pluralistic modern Jewish market. "Get lost" on Tel Aviv's beaches and boulevards, noting that Israel is not just an historic tourist site, but a living, breathing, experiment in creating a modern Jewish democracy. "Get lost" in the desert outside Be'er Sheva or the forests by the Golan, seeing what our forefathers and foremothers saw.

"Getting lost" in this way helps people own their experiences. As much as we honour and cherish our tour guides, once we become our own tour guides we internalize the experience better.

In that spirit, skipping one of the hotel breakfasts or fancy dinners and buying food in a supermarket or a makolet, a corner store, navigating the unfamiliar, interacting with non-English speakers, can prove very rewarding. And, of course, every good, happy "getting lost" story ends with salvation, finding your destination, often with waves of self-satisfaction and empowerment.

There is another dimension to "getting lost." Every visitor to Israel is a pilgrim who should be ready to get lost in some aspect of the Israeli or Jewish experience. It could be the history or the nature or the politics or the spirituality or the demographics. There is so much to learn.

Unfortunately, so many of us have been fed such a boring, thin, pathetic diet of Jewish and Zionist ideas and attitudes that a trip to Israel should serve as a shock to the system, like overdosing on sweets after Yom Kippur. We must go beyond the juvenile Judaism of cutesy stories and shticky rituals that slights the Torah's profundity, the Talmud's depth, Maimonides' genius, Theodor Herzl's vision.

We also need to go beyond the Israel-can-do-no-wrong advocacy models that overlook the complexity of history, the multi-dimensionality of democracy and the ongoing challenges of making this modern country the fulfilment of the Zionist dream in a messy world

Of course, this kind of "getting lost" truly helps us find ourselves, find our way – partially by charting new paths. So one last piece of advice – the same advice I give to March of the Living groups When you return and people ask, "How was the trip?" don't answer with the usual "great," "awesome," "fantastic." Challenge yourself – and others – by saying, "I don't know yet, we'll see."

Don't judge this trip by how much fun you had. Judge it – six months, 12 months, two years from now – by how much it changes you, what ideas and values you internalize, how you use it to move forward. Let this trip be a "reset" in your life – an opportunity to stretch and grow, becoming a more giving, more committed – and thus more connected and satisfied Jew, Zionist, and human being. ■

Women and Judaism

Sara Horowitz

Like many others involved in Jewish life and practice, I have been thinking about two recent articles about modern Orthodox Judaism, one by Jay Lefkowitz, the other by Michah Gottleib.

Both articles are deeply personal, drawing on the writers' sense of their attachment to Judaism and sense of themselves as religiously committed Jews. The articles drew impassioned responses in the press and on the web, from sympathizers and critics.

I know both authors (Jay's father is my first cousin, and Michah is my nephew) and respect their intelligence, sincerity and commitment to Judaism. Reading their articles has made me think about my own (somewhat different) Jewish trajectory, and how gender factors into finding one's place.

In an essay in Commentary magazine earlier this year, Jay Lefkowitz coined the term "social Orthodoxy" to connote living a life consistent with Jewish practice but not necessarily its theological sureties. With or without faith, religious observance links Jews across time and space. Lifestyle, you might say, keeps us a people.

In a column in the Forward, Michah Gottlieb reflected on why the Conservative movement loses committed Jews like him to modern Orthodoxy, pointing to what he saw as a halachic inconsistency in the Conservative movement, and little commitment to halachic observance by many Conservative Jews.

Jay's critics say that "social Judaism" – "behaving" as a Jew without necessarily believing – amounts to a shallow, hollow, unanchored or unsustainable religious life. Michah's critics took issue with his assertion that Conservative Judaism's focus on gender egalitarianism was a religiously inauthentic "distraction" from the attrition of learning and religious observance.

The two articles come out of very different approaches to Judaism. Yet, both convey a sense of modern Orthodoxy as a home for these authors – vital and meaningful. I sympathize. I grew up in the world of modern Orthodoxy, and it shaped my sense of Jewish life and Jewish ethics. It was, in childhood, a nurturing home. But I would no longer call myself Orthodox, even though I live a life as attuned to religious observance as many of the "social Orthodox," and arguably with more sense of spirituality and theology.

When I was a university student, many of the young women in my community looked for more involvement in Jewish ritual life. We did not anticipate anything as radical as women rabbis. We looked to small things, and we wanted to remain within the bounds of Halachah. We turned to the rabbis of our shuls with smaller questions: could a woman recite Kiddush on Shabbat on behalf of men? Could she be part of a mezuman – a quorum – for blessing after meals?

One fall, rabbis of several New York synagogues were approached by women in their congregations and asked whether a Torah scroll might be passed into the women's section, so that women might dance with it on Simchat Torah. The answers given to these questions – by particular rabbis of particular synagogues – were: yes, yes and yes.

Some congregants were offended by these changes, and took matters into their own hands. For example, in my synagogue, a group of high school yeshiva boys surged into the women's section and grabbed the Torah from the woman dancing with it. The next year, no Torah for the women.

Two things became clear to me: that the limitations placed on women in Judaism do not necessarily stem from genuine halachic restrictions, and that change would happen very slowly, if at all.

Today, Orthodox Judaism has begun to shift – from partnership minyan services where women can chant from the Torah, receive aliyot and lead parts of the service, to the designation of women as halachic decisors or advisors – although these options exist only at the fringes of the Orthodox community.

When I came of age, however, women who wanted more had two choices. Live with the limitations of our communities and the diminished possibilities they offered us, or venture out – to new egalitarian minyanim, to what was then counter-culture Judaism. I chose to venture, and the rest is commentary. ■

Why Jews should oppose a Christian law school

Adam Goldenberg

There I stood, 13 and terrified. At Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto, on a bimah that my grandfather had literally helped to build, I was chanting from a Torah scroll that his father had saved from their synagogue in eastern Poland and smuggled through the war – the same parchment from which my father, uncles and cousins had all read in turn.

The congregation's eyes seemed to bore tiny holes into my skull as I read the most infamous words of my Torah portion, Acharei Mot: "Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind: it is abomination."

Bathed in family history and tradition, I thought I was about to drown. I may not have been the first gay shlemazel to have to swallow the words of Leviticus 18:22 during his bar mitzvah, but as the text passed my lips, I still felt completely alone.

The following year, as I was beginning to come out to my family and friends, the Supreme Court of Canada told an evangelical Christian university that it was free to exclude gays from its teacher education program. More than a decade later, the same university, Trinity Western, is invoking that ruling – and my bar mitzvah portion – as it claims the right to open an anti-gay law school.

They're wrong, and anyone who truly cares about religious freedom should say so.

It's far from clear that the Supreme Court's 2001 decision – written, as it was, at a different time and on different facts – still empowers Trinity Western to discriminate against gays and lesbians. Yet even if it does, the university's anti-gay policy makes a mockery of freedom of religion. It's one thing for people of faith to believe that gays are doomed to eternal hellfire, but it's quite another to exclude them from a law school on that basis.

Read a Christian Bible cover to cover. It doesn't end well for the Jews, either. Still, those of us who don't accept Jesus Christ as lord and saviour are welcome at Trinity Western University – provided that we don't sleep with anyone of the same sex while we're there.

If allowing Jewish students to practise Judaism isn't a threat to Trinity Western's religious freedom, what's so different about allowing gay students to be gay? After all, according to evangelical Christians, we're all going to end up shvitzing in the same place.

Imagine if the university required Jewish students to promise to abstain from Judaism. If that isn't discrimination, neither was the Spanish Inquisition.

Can Christian scripture provide a basis for homophobia? Of course it can. Look no further than Leviticus 18:22. But the same set of texts might just as readily forgive racism, slavery or anti-Semitism. Why doesn't Trinity Western discriminate against Jews or blacks the way it discriminates against gays? Because only fanatics would ever accept religious excuses for the former, and nothing does more to discredit religious freedom than using it to justify bigotry.

Anti-gay discrimination should be no exception. Those of us who depend on freedom of religion to protect our own beliefs should be the first to condemn its misuse. That doesn't mean asking Christians (or Jews, or Muslims) to ignore scripture that prohibits homosexuality – though many do, and more should – but it does require us never to condone its use as a basis for odious discrimination. After centuries of blood libel, Jews are only too familiar with intolerance preached from the pulpit.

Those words that darkened my bar mitzvah portion – "v'et zachar lo tishkav mishk'vei ishah to'evah hu" – are chanted in synagogues around the world each year. After more than a decade, they still sting.

We can't rewrite Leviticus, nor can we force the faithful to overlook passages that give us pause. But that doesn't mean we can't distinguish religious belief from religious pretext. If freedom of religion can justify almost anything, then it will be good for almost nothing. It's up to those of us who need it to defend it from itself. ■

Why Herb Gray didn't have a state funeral

Michael Taube

The Right Honourable Herb Gray had a long career in Canadian politics. He held his seat in Windsor West for nearly 40 years. He never lost in 13 federal election campaigns. He faithfully served the Liberal party in different capacities, including as deputy prime minister.

That's great, but did it mean he should have had a state funeral after he died April 21? No, it didn't.

We'll get back to this point shortly.

Today's criteria for a state funeral in Canada are rather evergreen. Some people believe it should be determined by certain criteria, including years of service, impact on public life and historical significance. Others believe it's little more than a popularity contest to award friends and like-minded political ideologues.

Some Canadians perceive that Prime Minister Stephen Harper has based his decisions for state funerals on the latter principles. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Yes, former federal minister Jim Flaherty was a small "c" conservative who served in Harper's cabinet. But he received a state funeral for his impressive 20-year role in public life and managing the Canadian economy through the difficult global economic crisis. Flaherty was widely praised by the international community for his steady financial hand and business acumen. Hence he certainly deserved this honour.

Meanwhile, Harper also gave a state funeral to federal NDP leader Jack Layton. Some have argued the prime minister only did this to give the appearance of being even-handed. Nice try, but incorrect. Rather, he did it because Layton played a huge role in changing Canada's political narrative and brought the NDP from perennial third-party status to the Official Opposition. It's hard to say whether Layton would have ever reached 24 Sussex Drive. The fact he put his party in the position he did means he deserved this honour, too.

What about Gray? His 40 years in public service were solid, but hardly earth-shattering. He didn't introduce significant political and economic policies. He had little to do with important legislation. He had a dull personality and didn't stand head and shoulders above his political colleagues, Liberal or otherwise.

Gray was certainly present during many important political moments in his lifetime. Unfortunately, that's just it: he was present and little else.

So, what was unique about him? As Andrew Cohen's April 22 Ottawa Citizen column pointed out, "Gray was proud to be Canada's first Jewish cabinet minister. He grew up in a Canada that was not always kind to people of his ilk, but he succeeded nonetheless, studying commerce at McGill and law at Osgoode Hall."

Indeed, this was a great accomplishment and an important breakthrough for Canadian Jews with political aspirations. Yet this fact, no matter how noteworthy, has absolutely no bearing in deciding whether Gray deserved a state funeral.

By setting the bar at Gray's status as the first cabinet minister of a particular race, religion, gender or orientation, we would have to do the same for others. This would include the first Protestant, Catholic, black, Asian, Native Canadian and female cabinet ministers. Besides the fact this would create an enormous Pandora's box we could never close, what if these individuals didn't deserve a state funeral for other reasons? It would, therefore, set a bad precedent.

Meanwhile, if we're going to honour a Jewish Canadian politician with a state funeral, perhaps it should be the first one. That would be Henry Nathan, Jr., who was elected as a Liberal in Victoria, B.C., in 1871 (although he supported Sir John A. Macdonald, Canada's first prime minister and a Conservative). Alas, I'm not sure Nathan deserves this honour, and it would open up an even bigger can of worms for the selection process.

There are Liberals who should ultimately get state funerals, including former prime ministers Jean Chrétien and Paul Martin. There's no doubt a Jew will eventually get one, too. It just won't be Herb Gray. ■

In search of kosher chickens

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Finding a kosher chicken in Toronto hasn't been easy since a Montreal processor became the sole supplier in Canada.

The closure of Chai Kosher Poultry's Toronto operation in May 2013 created a shortage, and it's affected all of Ontario and other parts of Canada, said Richard Rabkin, managing director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, which is known by the name of its hechsher, COR.

He said Montreal's Marvid Poultry has "worked diligently to meet increased demand, but from all feedback, it's not sufficient."

Rabkin said his family has been eating chicken patties from Israel because of the kosher chicken shortage.

"In my family, my kids are not eating regular chicken. They're eating what's known in our house as 'dinosaur' chicken, processed chicken patties in the shape of dinosaurs.

"Other people are eating more fish. Some people prefer to eat kosher chicken, but given no choice, will buy non-kosher chicken, which is really unfortunate."

Rabkin said COR has been working to address the problem with the Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO), which represents more than 1,000 independent Ontario chicken farmers, as well as other stakeholders in the chicken-manufacturing community, including the Association of Ontario Chicken Producers, which represents the processors.

"Both of those groups have been quite supportive and have been working to find a solution for the shortage of kosher chicken in Canada. We're very thankful for their efforts."

Some "entities" have already stepped forward and expressed an interest in processing the chicken, Rabkin said. "It's an expensive endeavour, and there are a lot of logistical challenges an entrepreneur will have to navigate."

The CFO recently put a request for proposal on its website (www.ontariochicken.ca), seeking business plans from interested parties that articulate their interest, intent, experience and ability to process Ontario chicken, in Ontario, for kosher markets. The deadline is May 30.

The request for proposal gives parties who haven't already expressed interest in processing kosher chicken the chance to do so, said CFO spokesperson Michael Edmonds.

"As a responsible supply management board, we will make the chicken available to an entity that comes up with a successful business plan that meets the needs of Ontario's kosher community."

He said the board will review the submissions, but a structure to evaluate the business plans has yet to be determined.

"We may work with other consultants," he added.

Edmonds said the CFO is anxious to work with partners who can serve the kosher market and is looking forward to reviewing the proposals as they come in.

Rabkin said COR is very concerned about the shortage of kosher chicken.

"We share the concern of kosher consumers at the lack of availability of kosher chicken and we're working with all our stakeholders and are hopeful that a solution is forthcoming." ■

Make Israel truly Jewish, right-wing MK urges

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of Israel's most controversial political figures presented a bold and incendiary plan for the future of Israel to an enthusiastic Toronto crowd May 6, saying that he wants to bring full Jewish sovereignty to the nation.

Moshe Feiglin, deputy speaker of the Israeli Knesset, said his "alternative peace process" would include annexing disputed territories to ensure that Jews had complete control over Israel. Further, he argued that Israelis should encourage Arab citizens to leave and find a home elsewhere.

Feiglin, the head of the Likud party's Manhigut Yehudi (Jewish Leadership) faction whose ambitions to be prime minister are no secret, argued that Israel will only see more bloodshed if its leaders continue to abide by the Oslo accords. He believes his alternative plan for peace will revive Jewish identity in the region.

"We always thought that the Oslo process was about peace," Feiglin told a rapt audience of more than 100 at the Chabad Lubavitch synagogue in Thornhill. "It was not about peace. It was about getting rid of these territories in [the West Bank] that carry out our Jewish identity."

Feiglin said there are two dreams, a Jewish one and an Israeli one. The Jewish dream, he says, is "to fix in the world in the kingdom of God in our own land."

The Israeli dream, which he says Israeli leaders have adopted over the last 20 years, is to have Israel be like all other nations, with room for everybody.

"We need a solution that gives us the opportunity to make Israel a real Jewish state, and not a state of all citizens," he said. "If that's what God expects of us and we fulfil that goal, we have peace."

The Jewish Defense League of Canada and the Toronto Zionist Council sponsored Feiglin's appearance in Toronto. While the politician's ideas ignited the audience, many of whom gave him a standing ovation, some were suspicious about whether his plan would work.

Audience members challenged him on whether Israeli Arabs and Palestinians would react to this plan with extreme violence, as well as whether it would incite even more hatred and hostility toward Israel around the world.

Feiglin sidestepped these concerned and said that surveys from Israel indicate that around 60 per cent of Arabs are looking to leave Israel.

"This is not their land. It's ours," Feiglin said. "We should aid those who wish to leave… helping them find work, helping them find places to go and buy homes. We have that money, but today we invest it in continuing the Oslo process."

He added that an undeniably Jewish state would encourage Jews to immigrate to Israel and spawn a new wave of building and economic growth there. Israel has spent 1 trillion shekels on security, defence and Palestinian aid because of the current peace process, Feiglin estimates.

Feiglin's campaign has much support in Israel, especially among right-wing nationalists. The current deputy speaker was elected to the Knesset in December 2012 as a member of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud, although Netanyahu has repeatedly tried to oust him from the party.

Feiglin first turned to political activism after then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin signed the Oslo accords in 1993. He co-established Zo Artzeinu (This Is Our Land), a right-wing political movement that protested land concessions to Arabs, in the early 1990s.

Recently, the deputy speaker called on Netanyahu to investigate riots on the Temple Mount over the Pesach holiday. In April, Muslim extremists intimidated and pushed around Jewish visitors to the holy site.

Feiglin argues that having an Arab presence on the Temple Mount is not just destroying Jewish history, but severing a connection to the land.

"If we have no history, you're not really a nation," Feiglin told the crowd. "If you're not longing for the third Temple by going out there to the Temple Mount, not longing and praying, you're losing the first and the second."

Currently, Jewish visits to the Temple Mount are restricted, and Jews aren't allowed to pray on the site. A bill in the Knesset is in the works to establish equal prayer rights for Jews and Muslims on the Temple Mount. ■

WJC head issues warning about Europe

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Things may be good for Jews in Canada, but that isn't the case in much of the rest of the world, as 69 years after the end of World War II, anti-Semitism is on the rise in Europe, World Jewish Congress CEO Robert Singer said during his first official visit to Canada.

Singer spoke May 8 at an early-morning briefing for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) at the Lipa Green Centre.

"Israel, and the Jewish communities worldwide, need friends," Singer said. "They need allies and they need partnerships with different communities."

Finance Minister Joe Oliver was also in attendance, along with WJC Canadian vice-president Moshe Ronen, and Singer spoke glowingly of CIJA's work in conjunction with the international body, as well as Canada's strong stands in support of Israel and against anti-Semitism.

"Every time we have a problem, we come to Canadians first, because we know the ties are a lot deeper than just political," Singer said.

"I can say on behalf of the World Jewish Congress, the Israeli government and worldwide Jewry, we say thanks, and we hope it will continue this way."

Singer said there is cause for concern about the resurgence of anti-Semitism in Europe.

"Hungary is probably the best example of the changes Europe is going through. They had an election April 6 and the Jobbik party, which has a very clear neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic agenda, won 20.4 per cent of the votes," said Singer, a former IDF lieutenant colonel and official in the Israeli prime minister's office.

"In 2006, [Jobbik's result] was 2.2 per cent, [so] it increased 10 times," he added. "When you just think about it, a country in the centre of Europe that 70 years ago, lost about 440,000 Jews, and [now], over 1 million people [in Hungary] voted for a party with a clear anti-Semitic and neo-Nazi agenda."

This is a trend in Europe, where the WJC estimates that about 20 per cent of the new European Parliament will consist of right wing or neo-Nazi parties, including Germany's National Democratic Party and Golden Dome in Greece.

"There are many reasons why situations like this are happening in the world today," Singer said. "Seventy years after the Holocaust, after what Europe went through, Europe is once again not a nice place for Jews to live in."

In another recent example, in Donetsk, Ukraine, Jews were reportedly asked to register their property or face deportation.

But while things in Ukraine have become more dangerous, Singer said there's no reason to believe the current situation poses a greater security risk for Jews.

"At this stage, no specific harm was caused to Jews in Ukraine," said Singer, who was born in Ukraine and immigrated to Israel with his family when he was 15.

"The police are investigating things and no one's sure right now where the letters came from. We are monitoring the situations there, including the upcoming referendum."

Singer touched on some other pertinent topics, such as the persecution of Christians in the Middle East, where a group formerly totalling 30 per cent of the population has dwindled to less than 10 per cent amid unrest in Syria and Egypt.

"This is a major issue for the World Jewish Congress, and we, as the Jewish people who went through the Holocaust, won't remain silent as other groups are being prosecuted the way Christians are in the Middle East," Singer said.

"In Israel, there are over 180,000 [Christians], and it's the only place in the Middle East where the Christian population is growing."

Singer said the WJC will continue to look to Canada and CIJA for support.

"The World Jewish Congress is monitoring things and we're sharing our information with different governments," Singer said. "From what I saw [during my time in Canada], I'm not sure that anything like CIJA exists anywhere else in the world.

"There is the level of professionalism, involvement, the level of integration into the communities and the level of outreach to government."

New senior rabbi seeks to stabilize Holy Blossom

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Last month's appointment of Rabbi Yael Splansky as the next senior rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple is "significant but not unique," she believes.

More significant in the context of Holy Blossom per se is the direction in which the historic synagogue will move under her leadership.

The largest Reform congregation in Canada and one of the largest in North America, with 2,000 member units, Holy Blossom has faced recent challenges, including the 2012 departure of the temple's longtime tenant, Leo Baeck Day School's south branch, which is now in its own building.

As well, there was controversy over both the proposed re-orientation of the sanctuary, which currently doesn't face Jerusalem (as do those in many other shuls), and the upcoming retirement of Rabbi Splansky's predecessor, Rabbi John Moscowitz, who began a three-year, pre-retirement sabbatical in 2012.

The past two years have been a time of stabilization, Rabbi Splansky said in a recent interview, citing congregational surveys that included "grassroots conversations and thousands of cups of coffee."

Among her priorities is Holy Blossom's "Renewal Project," a long-awaited renovation launched in a 2000 "vision statement" by Rabbi Moscowitz. Phase 1 is slated to begin this fall, after the High Holidays. The sanctuary will be restored in Phase 2, but it won't be reoriented so that congregants pray facing Jerusalem. (Details on the project are available at http://www.holyblossom.org/renewal/.)

The board's announcement about Rabbi Splansky's new role praised her intellectual rigour, personal warmth, and deep understanding of the synagogue's place in the community.

In a broader context, she is one of several women to be appointed senior rabbi of a large congregation in the past year. Also, two years ago, Rabbi Lisa Grushcow became the first woman in Canada to lead a synagogue of more than 1,000 families when she was named senior rabbi of Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom.

In 1980, Holy Blossom itself became the first Canadian congregation to hire a female rabbi. An Orthodox shul that became Reform in the 1920s, Holy Blossom was founded 11 years before Canada itself, Rabbi Splansky noted.

By the time she started in 1998 as an assistant rabbi straight out of Hebrew Union College, "no one blinked" about hiring a woman.

Rabbi Yael Splansky

A 43-year-old married mother of three boys, Rabbi Splansky is also a fourth-generation Reform rabbi whose great-grandfather was a classmate and friend of Rabbi Leo Baeck's.

But there was never an expectation that she would follow in the footsteps of her father, Rabbi Donald Splansky, now a rabbi emeritus in the Boston area, even though women began to be ordained by the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College in 1972.

In retrospect – given her former youth group presidency, experience at Jewish summer camp and major in Jewish studies as an undergraduate – her career path was obvious.

"I thought it was this great revelation, but once I started coming out to friends about it, they said, 'Yeah, of course.'"

In addition to her usual duties at Holy Blossom, Rabbi Splansky edited the synagogue's new prayerbook, Siddur Pirchei Kodesh, and she is immediate past chair of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto.

Most recently, for the past year, she has served as Holy Blossom's acting senior rabbi, overseeing the transition following the beginning of Rabbi Moscowitz's sabbatical. Her installation date has not yet been set, but Rabbi Splansky said her work as senior rabbi starts immediately.

She's particularly excited about the atrium that will be created as part of the renewal project's first phase, which is expected to take about 18 months to complete.

Rabbi Splansky likes to refer to the atrium as "the living room for the congregation."

It's intended as "the meeting space, the gathering place, the place where people hang out and linger," she said. "The way the building is configured, there are all these narrow hallways. It's hard to bump into people, and it isn't particularly inviting."

As well, she noted, "What we're doing in space and mortar and brick is all about what we're doing in matters of the spirit – finding meaningful, joyful Judaism. No one should make the mistake of thinking we're just sprucing up the place."

Rabbi Splansky said she misses the "pitter patter" of Leo Baeck's presence in the building, even though the temple has its own religious school and early childhood centre, which expanded to include two-year-olds after the day school left.

The upside of the school's departure is a new ability "to breathe back into our own space."

Rental income from the school had been factored into the renovation budget, but "strong commitment" by lead donors to the project's campaign – which is currently being "ramped up" – is compensating, she said.

Another consideration is that the building, which dates back to 1938, is older than many GTA synagogues that have their own aging-building issues. "We've had a really tough winter," the rabbi said. "We need this [renovation] for basic infrastructure, and to meet the needs of coming generations."

Reflecting on challenges in her rabbinic career, she said, "To go into this work, you have to be a bit of a dreamer, and so we set our aspirations high, and by definition, you'll always fall short of that... But that's what spurs us on." ■

Baird open to sanctions on Russia: Cotler

dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird seemed open to the idea of Canada introducing sanctions against "[Vladimir] Putin's Russia" for the level of domestic repression going on there, according to Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Cotler crossed paths with Baird at Flughafen Airport in Frankfurt, Germany, recently while both were in transit and the two discussed various issues, Cotler related at a May 2 meeting with local reporters.

One of the concerns was repression and human rights violations within "Putin's Russia."

While Canada promptly imposed sanctions in response to Russian aggression in Ukraine, Cotler said, it has been reluctant in the context of Russia's domestic human rights abuses.

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird

"The two issues…are inextricably linked," Cotler said in a statement he issued one day earlier. "The same authoritarianism, revanchism, and criminality that have characterized the Putin regime's approach to human rights…have gone unpunished."

Cotler's view was also in the context of the case of Sergei Magnitsky, a Russian-Jewish lawyer who was jailed and then allegedly tortured to death in a Russian jail in 2009 for exposing widespread corruption.

Cotler has supported the efforts of American human rights activist Bill Browder, the CEO of Heritage Capital Management, who led the effort to have the U.S. Congress pass the Magnitsky Act requiring targetted sanctions against Russians implicated in the Magnitsky affair.

The European Parliament passed a resolution calling on European governments to do likewise, "but progress in Canada appears to have stalled," Cotler said in his statement and repeated to reporters.

This, even though in 2012 when Browder visited Ottawa, the all-party House Subcommittee for International Human Rights, which Cotler is involved in, unanimously called on the federal government to "explore options" in regards to imposing visa sanctions and freezing assets of those implicated in the Magnitsky affair.

"It is the time for Canada to sanction people involved in domestic repression in Russia," Cotler said at the press conference.

Cotler spoke after returning from an event-laden nine-day overseas trip commemorating the 70th anniversary of the genocide of Hungarian Jewry and participation at the climactic moments of this year's March of the Living trip. He said he experienced a "kaleidoscope of emotions" during the extremely poignant and moving trip, which included lighting a yahrzeit candle with Cecilia Wallenberg, great-niece of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who is credited with saving 100,000 Jews, and addressing a pro-Israel rally of mostly non-Jewish participants in Budapest.■

Could kosher food be cheaper?

Higher prices blamed on lack of competition in local supervision

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Thornhill housewife Alison Finkelstein has seen the comments on her Facebook pages questioning the cost of kosher food in Toronto – particularly meat – and whether the fees charged by the Kashruth Council of Canada – which administers the COR hechsher and is also known by that name – contribute to that expense.

Finkelstein, a Thornhill mother of five, has noticed that the price of kosher food in Toronto is higher than in Florida, where she often visits. Her friends have noticed, too.

Finkelstein says that following the demise of locally based Chai Poultry in 2013, the price of kosher chickens rose. She pays about $14 for a package of cut-up chicken that used to cost $9 or $10, she said.

"And the quality seems to have gone down from the Chai days," she claimed.

"It's become very expensive for roast too," she said. "A good cut of London broil for a family of seven usually costs between $35 and $40," she said.

Lawrence Lax has concerns over the high cost of kosher meat, too.

"There seems to be no voice to speak on behalf of the Jewish community regarding food pricing," he said. "It would seem appropriate that the largest organization representing the Jewish community, COR, should be a voice of the people."

Lax said he's seen people at the meat counter checking the prices, doing a double take, and making the purchase anyways. "People just lay down and roll over on this stuff," he said. "They don't feel they can have a voice."

For years, until the appearance in 2008 of Badatz Toronto on the scene, COR dominated the market on the certification of kosher products, though a few kashrut agencies from other cities supervised some production. With virtually no competition in the Toronto market, economic theory suggests prices will rise, and quality may suffer.

The kosher chicken and meat situation signals that consumers may be paying the price – but others say it's just a symptom of the larger problem, which is that COR wields a dominant position when it comes to kosher certification in Toronto.

Timothy Lytton, author of Kosher: Private Regulation in the Age of Industrial Food, believes "competition can be very good for kosher consumers." However, generally speaking, compared to packaged goods, there is much less competition in the food-service industry, which affects caterers, restaurants and supermarkets, resulting in "much more anti-competitive behaviour."

In the United States, Lytton explained, large certification agencies such as OU, Kof-K and Star-K work with national food manufacturers that produce kosher foods on supermarket shelves everywhere. "They will generally shy away from food services" and leave that to local agencies. There is a history of "local nasty politics" and "rivalry" among local agencies, he said.

The dispute between COR and the fledgling Badatz certification agency prompted intervention last December by AKO, the U.S.-based Association of Kashrus Organizations.

Rabbi Moshe Elefant, chief operating officer of OU, the world's largest kashrut certification agency, based in New York, was part of the delegation that came to the city to broker peace. He compared it to diplomats trying to bring Arabs and Israelis together. "We did shuttle diplomacy, but we never sat together," he said.

On paper, the dispute between COR and Badatz seems like a mismatch. While Badatz is a relative newcomer and supervises about 25 businesses – it recently scored something of a coup, certifying a Passover getaway at the White Oaks resorts attended by more than 600 people – COR is a major player in Canadian kosher supervision.

For decades, COR was part of Canadian Jewish Congress, but in 2000 it was incorporated as a non-profit charitable organization. Its financial information is available to the public on the Canada Revenue Agency website, and the data raises several questions.

COR's first filing with the CRA came in 2004, when it listed as its only revenue almost $1.4 million in "total gifts received from other registered charities." Explaining the large sum, a COR ad that ran recently in The CJN as an "Open Letter to the Jewish Community" noted that a $20,000 annual surplus over 30 years, invested with reasonable returns, gave it more than $1 million for start-up purposes when it left Congress.

The same year COR struck out on its own, it reported making a $1 million gift to the Matan Foundation, a charitable organization about which little is known other than that it was housed in the same building on Bathurst Street as COR at the time. Over the years, the two organizations have had some of the same directors on their boards.

COR has not explained the reason for the transfer of funds.

Beginning in 2006, Matan made charitable "gifts to qualified donees" of $464,035 (2006); $255,600 (2007); $49,800 (2008); $2,400 (2010); and $285,000 (2011).

Matan's CRA documents indicate the "qualified donees" in each case was the Kashruth Council of Canada, except in 2006, when Matan also gave $3,000 to Choson Kallah Fund of Toronto, $3,036 to Toronto Lakewood Minyan and $10,000 to the Mizrachi Organization of Canada, in addition to $448,000 given to COR.

COR's business has been growing significantly in recent years, according to its CRA filings. In 2005 it reported revenues of nearly $3.7 million and it paid compensation of about $3 million, of which $322,838 was for "administration." By 2012, COR reported total revenue of just over $5 million and total expenditures on all compensation of almost $4 million. It had 126 full-time employees.

Although it's a registered charity, it handed out $13,200 in charitable gifts that year.

In 2013, COR reported total revenue of $5.4 million and salary compensation of $4.1 million, including more than $1 million in administration costs, despite reporting a drop in the number of its full-time employees, from 126 to 37.

The filings indicate that nine of the 37 earned between $80,000 and $119,000 and one earned between $120,000 and $159,999. That left around $3 million in compensation for other employees.

COR also reported it held more than $1 million in cash, bank accounts and short-term investments. Total liabilities amounted to around $246,000.

COR allocated $2,500 in charitable gifts in 2013.

The CRA filings raise a number of questions. Among them: what is the relationship between COR and the Matan Foundation? Why did COR's total expenditures rise in a year it shed so many full-time employees? And why isn't the non-profit organization giving back more to the community in the form of charitable donations or lower fees?

COR refused to answer questions posed to it by The CJN. In an emailed statement, the kashrut agency wrote, "There is nothing COR wants more than to see our certified establishments prosper and for consumers to have access to kosher food at competitive prices."

But Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon, one of the founders of Badatz, isn't buying it. He estimates that kosher food produced in Toronto "costs consumers 10 to 15 per cent higher [than it otherwise would] because of COR."

Rabbi Bensalmon's son, Moti, a spokesperson for Badatz, said Badatz charges its clients fees that are 10 to 15 per cent less than COR's, sometimes 30 per cent less.

"If we didn't exist, they [COR] could charge $40 to $50 an hour [for supervision]. Who's going to keep them in check?" he asked, adding that COR's fees to caterers for its mashgichim has ranged from $35 to $38 an hour – and $42 to $45 for larger institutional clients – compared to Badatz's consistent $30 hourly rate.

Though COR's fees amount to only a fraction of a kosher food producer's costs, Moti Bensalmon believes they have an impact on the extent of competition in the marketplace.

"There are small companies out there who would like to get certified but can't afford it, which leads to less competition on certain items, whereby the kosher consumer is stuck buying products with the higher cost," he said.

And as for COR and its multi-million dollar revenue stream, "I think if COR would act as a non-profit organization they would be able to lower their fees to restaurants and caterers and more places would be able to stay in business."

But with only about 25 clients, Badatz's influence on prices is limited.

And that might be one of the reasons Alison Finkelstein, Lawrence Lax and others like them find the cost of kosher food so high these days.

Next week, our "Behind the Label" series concludes with a look at potential conflicts of interest in the kosher supervision industry and some solutions that might solve the problem.

Historic menorah donated to ICAO in Montreal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@cjnews.ca

A six-foot brass menorah that one of Romania's most prominent Jewish leaders shipped out of the country before World War II, and which survived the Blitz in London will find a permanent home at a United Nations building in Montreal.

Israeli Consul General Joel Lion announced at a Yom Ha'atzmaut reception held at the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) that the menorah has been donated to that UN agency and will be displayed there as a gift of the State of Israel.

The huge edifice on University Street is decorated throughout with objects from many of its 191 member countries, but this will be the first from Israel, Lion said.

The menorah belonged to Lazar Margulies, a wealthy and influential textile industrialist in Bucharest, who settled in Montreal during the war with his wife Selma and the orphaned niece and two nephews they raised as their own children.

The children of their niece, Neri Bloomfield, Evelyn Bloomfield-Schachter and Harry Bloomfield, were on hand for the official presentation to ICAO director of administration Fang Liu.

Margulies, who was born in 1876, was a leading Zionist in prewar Europe and a delegate at the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland. He was a personal friend of Chaim Weizmann, who would become Israel's first president, and of Theodor Herzl.

Margulies was a respected figure in Romania, and was appointed in 1932 to the government's new Economic Council, the only Jew among its 25 members.

However, when official anti-Semitism started to intensify, he sold the business and went to England in 1938. The family's house was bombed by the Luftwaffe, but the solid seven-branched candelabra was undamaged.

Soon after, the family immigrated to Montreal – bringing the menorah with them.

Margulies and his wife continued their Zionist activism here, and when the Israeli consulate opened on Pine Avenue in Montreal in 1949 – the first in Canada – they gave the menorah to the first consul general, their friend Avraham Harman, later president of the Hebrew University. Margulies died in 1962.

The menorah remained on display in the consulate in its many locations over the past 65 years right up to the current one in Westmount Square.

Bloomfield and his sisters readily agreed to Lion's suggestion that the menorah – the symbol of Israel over the millennia – should be seen in ICAO and would be a fitting gift before his departure from Montreal this summer. In addition to his duties as consul general to Quebec and the Maritimes, Lion has been Israel's permanent representative to ICAO for the past three years.

Lion said the menorah will be displayed with a plaque about the Margulies story on one side and the Israeli flag on the other.

While economic and cultural ties between the province and Israel continue to grow, Lion said his wish is to see Quebec open an office in Israel as Ontario has done in Tel Aviv. ■

It was a Saturday night to remember!

More than 40 hosts across Toronto and New York City opened their homes to friends and family on April 5 for an evening of fun and games! Baycrest Health Sciences, a world leader in brain health, care, research, education and innovation, received more than $115,000 in donations from Game Night partygoers.

Our heartfelt thanks to the fun-loving, generous party hosts who entertained their nearest and dearest on Game Night. You are helping Baycrest transform the journey of aging today, and for generations to come.

Special thanks to our party hosts

IN THE SILENCE BETWEEN THE WORDS: THE ADULT CHILDREN OF DIVORCE

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

One of the tasks of true friendship is to listen compassionately and creatively to the hidden silences.
Often secrets are not revealed in words, they lie concealed in the silence between the words or in the depth of what is unsayable between two people.
– John O'Donohue (1956-2008) Irish poet, author, priest, and philosopher
From Anam Cara: A Book of Celtic Wisdom

Common sense informs most of you that Divorce hurts children of younger years for obvious reasons. Formerly, it was thought that breaking up a bad marriage was much better for children than waiting until they grew up, at least until they moved out. Long term studies, such as Judith Wallerstein's "Legacy of Divorce" have proven that in the absence of violent/abusive situations, this myth may be very problematic. Quite the opposite is true. Children of divorced parents have been shown to be at far greater risk of divorce themselves, criminal behaviour, substance abuse and other problems than those kids whose parents with troubled relationships who either stayed together or deferred separation until the children had move out permanently.

However, far fewer studies have been published on the effect of divorce on adult children. Children who have moved out or have "grown up" often suffer in silence when their parents separate. Although no longer living at home, many parents of such adult children forget the boundaries they taught their children by putting them "in the middle" of disputes arising from the separation or by using their children as shoulders on which to cry. Such behaviour often shatters an adult child's own sense of stability and identity with which he or she has identified all his/her life. That stability is based on the marriage that nurtured their very being and much of who they have become. By attempting to force such an adult child to take sides, offspring can develop an enormous degree of stress, leading to emotional problems and occasionally, stress in their own marriages. Sometimes such stress can be a factor leading to divorce with their own spouses. Moreover, in cases where an adult child has already been alienated when young by one parent against the other, such conduct by parents can further intensify such feelings of alienation.

So what to do? Is there such a thing as a healthy divorce?

In the quote above, Irish poet John O'Donohue describes what two friends mean to each other, how the secrets of friendship blossom "between the words." It means to "listen compassionately and creatively to the hidden silences." In a remarkable Shabbat morning speech, Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Thornhill's BAYT schul recently remarked that it is between the words where one finds God. As applied to the adult children of divorce, I interpret such wisdom to mean that in order to protect your adult child's stability and sense of self-worth keep your mouth shut. No matter how close you may be to your kids and no matter how badly you want them as your "allies": don't. As difficult as this is to read, a child does not owe you any greater allegiance when you separate.

Your only comment? "Mom/Dad and I will work things out. That's all you need to know." And you say it even if your spouse fails to play by the same rules. Why? Because the silence between each of those words will be quietly understood as your gift of love as a parent, no different than the tuition or hockey fees or braces you paid so long ago, or maybe it was just those bedtime hugs and nighttime stories. It is "unsayable" because your silence is your expression of parental love and selflessness. The adult child will listen very intently to that silence. He or she will appreciate it more than you can imagine. Meanwhile go hire a professional therapist and lawyer to whom you should complain, not your adult child. Don't "parentify", be a parent.

Israeli caught in human trafficking nightmare

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Anton Soloviov

For 25-year-old Israeli Anton Soloviov, the dream of working in Canada turned into a nightmare of human trafficking with threats of deportation, random fines for so-called infractions and ultimately death threats.

Brought into the country as a temporary foreign worker seven months ago, he and others in the same situation worked without pay for their expatriate-Israeli employers, who used the threat of deportation to keep their employees in line.

Last fall, while still in Israel, Soloviov saw an online advertisement for work abroad that promised earnings of up to $5,000 a month. Though his best friend warned him it looked too good to be true, it was an opportunity Soloviov couldn't pass up. He applied online, interviewed with Canadian business owner Dor Mordechai over the phone and flew to Vancouver in October 2013.

Mordechai and his wife, Anna Lepski, hired him as a foreign worker for their company, 0860005 B.C. Ltd., which operates kiosks in British Columbia malls. At first things seemed OK. "The first few weeks were wonderful. They showed us around and took us to Service Canada to get our SIN numbers," he recalls. ■

More Lev Tahor members flee to Guatemala

More members of the controversial ultra-Orthodox sect Lev Tahor appear to have left Canada.

Eight sect members – two adults and six children – fled Ontario to Guatemala in March ahead of a court hearing to determine whether the children should be placed in foster care. They appear to have been joined in the Central American country by at least 25 other Lev Tahor adherents, according to the Montreal Gazette.

A relative of the children told the newspaper that he recently travelled from Israel to see the family in the village of San Juan de Laguna, about two hours east of Guatemala City. He said he counted about 30 adults living in a two- or three-room shack.

The man – referred to as "K" because a youth court has ordered the identities of the children to be protected – spent the month of April in Guatemala tracking down his sister. He made several visits to the shack where the adults were living before he was finally permitted to speak with her.

"Armed with a metal bar for protection, I told her that if she did not come out, I would break in. So she finally agreed to come outside and talk with me," the man told the Gazette through a Hebrew interpreter.

Through members of the local Jewish community in the village, K found out that the children were sleeping on the dirt floor of the shack and that there is no plumbing. He said they receive barrels of fresh water once a week.

The sect's Toronto-based lawyer, Guidy Mamann, said Lev Tahor members are feeling unwelcome in Canada and are considering living elsewhere.

"They have an opportunity to find somewhere where they can go," he said. "I'm sure the group is discussing a number of possibilities. Guatemala is one of them."

About 200 sect members fled Quebec to Ontario last year ahead of a Quebec youth court hearing to seize some of the children. Earlier this year, some sect members fled to Trinidad and Tobago just as an Ontario court was to hear an appeal of the Quebec order. They were apprehended and returned to Canada. Those who went to Guatemala were granted temporary refugee status for up to 90 days. ■

Montreal's Jewish library celebrates 100 years

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

The cover photograph on the 2014 Jewish Public Library (JPL) calendar conveys a subliminal message. A nun wearing a habit is immersed in a book. A gentleman seated opposite her reads a Yiddish newspaper. Their comfort level illustrates how this cultural centre has served as an inclusive community landmark.

The Yiddishe-folks-Bibliotek officially opened its doors on May 1, 1914, at 669 St-Urbain St. Over the years, the library made several moves to accommodate the westward migration of Montreal's Jewish community. Since 1975, JPL has been located at 1 Cummings Square, 5151 Cote-Sainte-Catherine Rd.

The JPL will present its 100th anniversary exhibit, Stories Told: 100 years of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal, at Bibliothèque et Archives nationales du Québec from June 10 to July 27, showcasing JPL's contributions to city life over the century. The exhibition will also be on display at Montreal City Hall and at the Montreal Jewish Community Campus.

The exhibit marks the start of a major fundraising campaign, with original photos and artifacts highlighting the library's role as a cultural hub. The slate of events is underway and is scheduled to continue all year. The library has digitalized more than 4,400 photographs and documents, making them available to online users worldwide through the Canadian Jewish Heritage Network.

The work being done at JPL benefits everyone, says Michael Crelinsten, executive director of the library since 2010. Citing studies conducted at York University, the University of Chicago and Woodrow Wilson School of International Affairs at Princeton University, Crelinsten explains how exposure to fictional and nonfictional characters and scenarios through visits to libraries, museums and theatres increases an individual's empathy for others.

"We can draw a direct parallel between the function of literature in generating support for the community," he contends. "Therefore, [culture] is a strategic investment, not something that should be put aside just because it's harder to measure the short-term effect.

"We need to come together as a community to move forward. As Jews, we have always been recognized as people of the book and associated with leadership and philanthropy. A 100th anniversary is the once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to support an iconic institution. JPL archives hold the history and patrimony of the Montreal Jewish community, which is one of the most unique in the world."

JPL needs to purchase equipment, expand and update eBook and computer room facilities among other expenses. Financial support is essential to ensure the future of JPL as a world-class cultural centre, Crelinsten says. Approximately 21 per cent of Canadian households lack Internet access, and that includes 50 per cent of low-income households. Since 19 per cent of Montreal's Jewish community live below the poverty line, JPL needs to support this segment of the community.

The Jewish Public Library features four main divisions and numerous subdivisions. The main library houses the Computer Space and Technology Centre, a specialized Judaica collection and a prized rare book collection. The library's archives are treasured by scholars, government, and social and educational organizations throughout the country. The Norman Berman Children's Library serves children and young families by building early literacy, conducting outreach programs and partnering with schools and daycares.

A constituent agency of Federation CJA, JPL, a nonprofit organization, welcomes more than 100,000 visitors each year. During Jewish Book Month, initiated in 1944, JPL brings internationally renowned authors to speak to more than 1,600 students. Other events, such as the J. I. Segal awards, draw world famous authors.

Israeli bill barring prisoner release panned

SPENCER HO
TIMES OF ISRAEL

An Israeli bill that would bar the release of Palestinian prisoners sentenced to life imprisonment was approved Sunday by a committee of government ministers.

The bill will go next to the Knesset for a first reading, and if it's signed into law, the president will no longer be able to pardon convicted criminals who have been sentenced by a judge to a life sentence without parole.

If passed, the measure would hamstring leaders from being able to offer prisoner releases in exchange for political concessions in peace talks with Palestinians, although it would only apply to a minority of jailed terrorists.

It's not yet clear whether the law applies only to murderers sentenced after the law passes or also to those convicted in the past.

The release of convicted murderers became one of the most divisive issues within Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's ruling coalition over the past year, after he agreed to release more than 100 prisoners at the outset of the most recent round of talks.

Economy Minister Naftali Bennett, who heads the Jewish Home party and has threatened to quit the government over recent prisoner releases, hailed the bill's passage.

"The State of Israel has opened a new chapter in the war against terror and in its moral obligation to bereaved families," he said. "Years of extortion and wholesale releases of terrorists will stop with the passage of this bill in the Knesset. I congratulate the ministers on their support of the law. The Jewish Home will work in the coming session to pass the bill [quickly]."

"The prime minister who released dozens of terrorists in various deals, who was the head of the government that chose to release terrorists rather than [freeze settlement construction] now supports a law to prevent the release of terrorists," she said. "More proof, one of many, of the inconsistencies and political fickleness of our prime minister."

Meanwhile, the Palestinian Prisoner Affairs Minister Issa Qaraqe said the bill, dealt a blow to any possible peace deal. He called Israeli leaders shortsighted and said such a law would not aid Israel, as there would be no deal without the release of prisoners from Israeli jails.

Qaraqe's deputy, Fatah party official Mohammed al-Madani, said the bill is the final nail in the coffin of peace talks that ended last month. He said Netanyahu pulled the mask of peace from his face.

Nearly 80 prisoners were released over the nine months of talks with the Palestinians, including many who had murdered Israelis in attacks over 20 years ago. Numerous right-wing ministers and MKs threatened to quit their posts and withdraw their parties from the government ahead of slated fourth and final prisoner release, which Palestinians were demanding include Israeli-Arab terrorists.

Netanyahu delayed the final round indefinitely, demanding that the Palestinians first agree to extend the peace talks past the end of April deadline.

The talks eventually broke down completely after a series of unilateral moves by both sides that culminated in a unity deal between the PA and Hamas, which Israel considers a terrorist group and refuses to negotiate with. ■

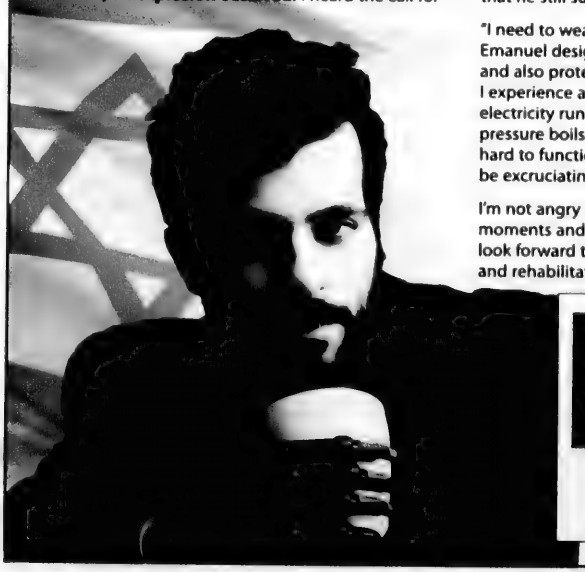
"THERE'S NOT A SINGLE THING A TWO-HANDED PERSON CAN DO THAT I CAN'T"

Emanuel Aminof, 23, lost his right hand in a military exercise that went terribly wrong on January 13, 2010. He was in the Platoon Commander's tank when an anti-aircraft missile got stuck in one of the cannons.

"While I was extracting the mortar from the cannon, an explosion occurred. I heard the call for my urgent evacuation. I realized how badly injured I was. I had lost my right hand." Unfortunately, Emanuel needed several surgeries requiring the amputation of his arm.



Emanuel maintains a positive attitude, despite the fact that he still suffers daily.

"I need to wear either a hook or a bionic hand (that Emanuel designed) at all times, because it is practical and also protects me. Without this protection I experience a lot more pain, the constant feeling of electricity running through my arm and terrible pressure boils. Due to these after-effects, it is really hard to function and doing even the simplest task can be excruciatingly painful.

I'm not angry at anyone. I recall those dreadful moments and know that I could have died. Now I look forward to each day and continuing my recovery and rehabilitation at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv."

Emanuel's message of courage and hope is real for the over 50,000 disabled veterans in Israel. He knows that Beit Halochem is there to help each step of the way in making life better.

At our Beit Halochem Centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Nahariya, Haifa and Beer Sheva, there is a meeting of generations. Young disabled veterans like Emanuel are encouraged by older members from as far back as the War of Independence. Friendships are formed and isolation minimized. Together they help each other deal with the complex world of disability.

Beit Halochem will always be there to provide exceptional rehabilitative services including: physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, therapeutic devices, specialized sports equipment and training, family-oriented programming, creative and cultural activities.

Beit Halochem assists the wounded from the time they are injured and for the rest of their lives.

OPINION

What does being 'pro-Israel' mean?

Gerald Steinberg

The members of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations recently rejected the application of J Street to join their ranks. The founder and main force behind J Street claims to be entirely "pro-peace and pro-Israel," but many longtime and deeply committed supporters of Israel aren't convinced. J Street's case was not helped when it allied with a lobbying group for the Iranian regime or defended U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's foolish use of the term "apartheid" (for which he quickly apologized).

At the same time, in New York, a debate is raging over participation in the annual Celebrate Israel parade. In recent years, protests have increased over the participation of groups such as the New Israel Fund that have, in different ways, provided support to anti-Israel boycotters, lawfare and other hostile actions deemed to go beyond legitimate criticism within the "Zionist big tent." And in Britain, there's a similar controversy over an organization known as Yachad.

In these debates, the need for consistent definitions is increasingly important. Clearly, saying that one is "pro-Israel" is not enough – it's very easy to say one thing and do something quite different, or to present different faces to different audiences. To qualify as pro-Israel, there must be some minimal standards and definitions that are not only accepted in theory, but also implemented in practice. And as Mitchell G. Bard, head of the American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise, recently wrote, "Defining 'pro-Israel' is not rocket science."

Bard articulates 13 principles, in parallel to Maimonides' 13 Attributes, but the basics can be covered in three or four core points. The most basic is the acceptance of the legitimacy of Israel as the independent sovereign state of the Jewish People, with status equal to the almost 200 members of the United Nations. Jewish sovereign equality in the Land of Israel is the fundamental underpinning of Zionism, and if an individual or organization rejects any part of this foundation, the label "pro-Israel" does not apply. Groups that are allied with or promote the boycott, divestment and sanction campaign that seeks the destruction of Israel and promotes a "one-state" formula, meaning the end of Jewish national sovereignty, cannot be considered "pro-Israel." They might be naively utopian or anti-Semitic, but they're not Zionists.

In his list, Bard emphasizes respecting Israeli democracy and not substituting distant and private opinions for the decisions made by Israeli voters and their elected representatives. After 2,000 years of exile and many sacrifices, the Jewish People fought hard for independence, which includes the right to make mistakes. Whether well-meaning or not, those who are convinced that Israelis are unable to run their own lives, that outsiders know what's best and that they are acting "to save Israel from itself" are paternalistic, responsible for major damage and not "pro-Israel".

Many supposedly "pro-Israel" voices bombard the Jewish community, the non-Jewish media and other audiences with messaging that constantly criticizes Israel, far out of proportion and without context. Instead of celebrating Israeli achievements, they harp on the imperfections – and no society is perfect. Singling out Israel with double standards is hardly helpful in the context of immoral political warfare, including boycotts and demonization at universities and from Methodist, Presbyterian, Quaker and other Christian denominations.

Furthermore, the term pro-Israel indicates pro-active support – groups that are merely neutral on Israel and display a "take it or leave it" attitude towards Zionism also don't qualify. Self-proclaimed pro-Israel progressive organizations such as J Street and the New Israel Fund need to be much more visible in the media and in other battlefields where Israel is under vicious attack on a daily basis. Recognition of pro-Israel status is not simply a matter of prestige, but is very much an issue of substance. The designation must be earned and then displayed with pride. ■

We have to protect our kids, not criminals

RAHEL BAYAR AND MEIRA BAYAR ELLIAS

We are sisters. One of us is a former child abuse and sex crimes prosecutor. One of us is a licensed social worker who has worked clinically with victims of sexual abuse and is also a victim of sexual assault. One of us is a member of the Orthodox community. One of us was a member of the Orthodox community. We are writing about the case of Evan Zauder.

Evan Zauder was a teacher at Yeshivat Noam in New Jersey. He worked for over a decade with children. In January 2013, he pled guilty to transportation, receipt and distribution of child pornography, possession of child pornography and enticement of a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity. He admitted committing sex crimes against children.

More than 50 letters were sent on Zauder's behalf to the judge determining his sentence. Pillars of the Orthodox community: rabbis, teachers, friends and family members asked the judge for leniency. On this list are many names we know – intelligent, kind and valued members of their communities. They are not evil. Yet the words they used were not intelligent, kind or of value. Many referred to Zauder's "mistake" or "struggle." They called him a "good and decent person who lost control." They laud the time he spent alone with students and campers, stating he was always "honourable, respectful and caring."

These letters have provoked much comment regarding the many "big names" who wrote them. They asked the judge to consider all that made Zauder an integral part of their community not only as an admitted child molester. They ignored the fact he violated parole by accessing child pornography on a monitored computer. In making their case, they forget that the victims are more than just victims.

Pedophilia, child molestation or child pornography are not "activities." They are crimes. It is unconscionable to refer to Zauder's "poor decision," to state he knows "the error of his ways" and made a "grievous mistake." It is horrific someone could state Zauder was "honourable, respectful, caring and gentlemanly." These words minimize his acts.

Reading these letters we saw little consideration for the victims. We question those who praised Zauder's restraint for the times he was alone with children and did not succumb. How does the writer know these children were safe? How could a child be comfortable coming forward when their role model and protector is on a list of people requesting leniency for Zauder? The question should not be how best to come to the aid of the predator but rather how we as a community can reach out, protect defenceless children and create a safe space where children are supported and not re-victimized by their community.

One of us was assaulted on a yeshiva class trip. While the teacher informed responded appropriately, other educators blamed me for the assault. I left the program, and a prominent educator in the school called me a quitter, telling my parents I was a failure. That moment was the start of a journey away from a toxic environment, away from Orthodoxy.

One of us remains Orthodox – but in trepidation. When community members neutralize a perpetrator's crimes by praising his "leadership qualities" they negate the seriousness of his crimes. They allow misperceptions about child abuse to permeate our collective understanding. How can we trust our educators, schools, camps and leaders?

The question must be asked: Who is of greater value to the community – our children or those who prey upon them?

These letters raise the likelihood that the next victim may not speak out. We have a moral obligation to give our children a safe place to share. We do not have a co-equal obligation to speak on behalf of our criminals. ■

Jewish music has something for everyone

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish Music Week, as a festival, may still be a toddler – it was founded only in 2011 – but it's been growing over the years, along with its audiences. Last year, every seat in some venues was filled a half-hour before the concerts started.

Judy Jacobs, the festival's managing director, said that "people who attended were pleased with the variety of musical styles and with the quality of the performances and friends bring friends."

Jewish Music Week (JMW), running this year from May 18 to 25, includes related films and lectures in its celebration of Jewish music. Morning and afternoon events are free and most evening presentations are ticketed.

The Kids from Brooklyn: The songs of Carole King, Neil Diamond, Neil Sedaka and Barry Manilow, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, is one of the week's highlights. To be held at 7:30 p.m. on May 21, it features Cantor Simon Spiro, the Manhat-tones, the Brill Building Orchestra and the a cappella group Cadence.

Spiro, who is Beth Tzedec Congregation's senior cantor, has been called the "British Jazz Singer" for balancing dual careers in both cantorial and popular music. He's had hit singles on the Israeli and British pop charts. For tickets, visit www.tocentre.com.

Another JMW highlight is the Canadian debut of a contemporary Israeli group, The Vanunu Ethno Jazz Ensemble, at 8 p.m. on May 20 at the Lula Lounge. The ensemble fuses classic Jewish nigunim with ethnic Middle Eastern and jazz styles. Their sound is modern yet rooted in tradition. Led by Eli Vanunu on saxophone, the band features three other hot Israeli jazz players: Dor Heled (piano), Igor Kogan (double bass) and Uri Seelig (drums).

A tribute to the late Arieh (Arik) Einstein, at 7:30 p.m. on May 22 at the Monarch Tavern, features Israeli-born jazz singer Ori Dagan. The tribute should attract some Israeli audience members. Einstein was a pioneer of Israeli rock music and is widely regarded as the greatest and most influential Israeli singer and musician of all time.

David Buchbinder, a musician who works in the worlds of jazz, klezmer, world music and Arabic fusion, has put together Toronto's Real Klezmer Supergroup – the top klezmer players in Canada – for JMW. The group performs at 7 p.m. on May 18 at the Rex Jazz and Blues Bar. Accessibility is a keyword for JMW.

"Not everyone has the financial means to buy tickets and not everyone can get around town," said Aliza Spiro, the week's artistic director. She and her husband, Cantor Simon Spiro, founded JMW.

The festival comes to the audience, offering free daytime presentations, including a morning film and lecture series, live performances at lunchtime and a 2 to 3 p.m "afternoon tunes" series. Venues are located almost from the foot of downtown Toronto to Thornhill. Events are being held at Toronto City Hall's Nathan Phillips Square, the Prosserman and Miles Nadal Jewish community centres, seniors centres, a library, a hospital and at several synagogues.

A highlight of unticketed JMW events is Vocals for Victoria. A Victoria Day music marathon from noon to 4 p.m. on May 19 at Nathan Phillips Square, it features some "phenomenal local ensembles," Spiro said. They include a Jewish barbershop quartet, a Jewish all-female jazz quartet and a vocal chamber choir.

Another unticketed event, a community Melavah Malka with the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, to be held at 10:15 p.m on May 24 at Holy Blossom Temple, features eight cantors. Aliza Spiro, a singer-songwriter, hosts a free event, the Jewish Music Comedy Hour, at 2 p.m. on May 23 at the Jazz Bistro. She will be joined by local cabaret performers singing funny Jewish songs.

JMW encourages children to take an interest in Jewish music through its annual art contest. The contest "helps kids get connected with Jewish music and the arts in general," Spiro said. Winners are picked by prominent members of the art community.

Jacobs added that "we're not just encouraging creativity. We're developing Jewish personalities." Jacobs, whose background is in education, recalled that one young artist at last year's Meet the Artists reception was "very introverted" going in.

"The confidence this girl gained at the event was remarkable" she said. In previous years, the contest, which has been renamed the Bogoroch Art Contest in honour of a JMW donor, had been restricted to students from grades 1 to 12. But this year, seniors were eligible to participate, too.

You can meet this year's winners and view their works at a reception from 3 to 4:30 p.m. on May 25 at Gallery MNJCC at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. For more information about JMW, visit www.jewishmusicweek.com. ■

Nir Bareket celebrates 50 years with gallery exhibit

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Whether it is the intensity of a look, the sparseness of a stage, or the drama of a gesture, Nir Bareket's photographs don't just capture the facts of the moment, but they also capture its wonder.

The Market Gallery presents an exhibition entitled Nir Bareket: My Eyes Have Seen. Celebrating 50 years of photography. The exhibit features photographs from the Bareket collection, the City of Toronto Archives, and the Ontario Jewish Archives Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre (OJA).

The wide-ranging photographs feature images from various series: Theatre in Toronto (1976-2003); The Don Jail (1978-1987); The Amsterdam Calendar (1978); The Toronto Calendar (1981); The Homeless in Toronto (1982-2004); and The March of the Living (1994).

"What I find amazing is not just the individual photos, but the breadth of the portfolio. For five decades, Bareket has been photographing theatre in New York City, in Jerusalem and in Toronto, capturing moment after moment. The photographs provide evidence that these plays existed, that they happened at all, keeping for posterity the magic of theatre," said Michael Wallace, executive director, Theatre Museum Canada.

Bareket was commissioned in 1994 by March of the Living to document the trip. These photographs, now part of the collection of the OJA, include images of participants visiting Jewish cemeteries, the Jewish ghetto in Krakow, and the concentration camps in Poland.

"In Bareket's photographs, one feels the bleak coldness of the landscape. The horror and despair that occurred there is visceral, and is evident in these haunting photographs," says Dara Solomon, director of the OJA.

"And yet, the faces of the students, though filled with anguish, provide a light – a youthful warmth – hope. The brilliance in Bareket's approach is his ability to maintain both the invisibility of a journalist and the eye of the artist – capturing the beauty of these grief-filled moments."

The Amsterdam Calendar series comes from Bareket's 1976-78 stay in the Dutch city representing Toronto in the Toronto Amsterdam Artist Exchange Program. Bareket created a portfolio of photographs based on the concept of the calendar. He photographed individual numbers from one to 31 to represent the days of the month. These numbers appeared on walls, doorways, signs, essentially anywhere that people lived and worked in Amsterdam.

"Almost 35 years later, the archives acquired another calendar portfolio created by Nir Bareket, but in this case, the subject is Toronto, Bareket's home," said Michele Dale, City of Toronto Archives.

Bareket shot The Toronto Calendar series in 1981.

"Toronto is my city, and I like to think I know parts of it very well," said Bareket.

The photographs of The Don Jail series became the first acquisition by the archives of the City of Toronto of work by a contemporary, living photographer.

"Nir Bareket's photos catch the essence of the mood of the jail: sombre, severe, inhuman, without a soft edge. I was astounded when Nir first showed me his photos. They glowed with the jail's powerful truth. Bareket's photo of the jail's main entrance hangs in my home. I contemplate it daily," said John Sewell, former mayor of Toronto.

Following studies at the New York Institute of Photography and the School of Visual Arts in New York City, Bareket worked as a commercial photographer in New York City, in Geneva, Switzerland, and spent three years as chief photographer for the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. Bareket settled in Toronto in 1975.

Bareket has had numerous solo exhibitions dating from 1966 to the present day, including public galleries in New York City, Israel, Stanford University and Toronto. Major public collections in the United States, Holland, Israel, and Canada include Bareket's photographs.

More recently, Bareket has been focusing on social commentary – an attempt to capture elements of society most people tend to ignore. Bareket dares us to look.

"During the last couple of decades, searching for meaning became my main focus. Now, after my first 50 years as a photographer, the search continues. Photography is not a sprint, it is a marathon," said Bareket. ■

Nir Bareket: My Eyes Have Seen will be on display until July 19 at the St. Lawrence Market, 95 Front St. E. There is no admission fee.

TORONTO JEWISH LITERARY FESTIVAL AND JEWISH BOOK AWARDS

Once upon a time, Toronto's two major Jewish book events, the Jewish Book Festival and the Canadian Jewish Book Awards, were held at opposite ends of the calendar. But all that changed a few years ago when the two events were wisely merged into the Toronto Jewish Literary Festival.

This season's Festival, which occurs May 25 to June 1 at several venues around the city, offers a particularly rich roster of events; all programs are free or pay-what-you can:

Toronto-born reporter and author Matti Friedman, who has been called a "modern-day Indiana Jones," speaks on his award-winning book The Aleppo Codex at Temple Emanu-El, 120 Old Colony Rd., May 26, 7:30 p.m.

More literary gold comes in the form of Nora Gold, author of the newly-published novel Fields of Exile, which has been described as "the first novel about anti-Israelism in the academe." (Artscape Youngplace, 180 Shaw St., Thursday May 29, 7:30 p.m.)

Lethbridge professor of English Goldie Morgentaler speaks on the prominent late Canadian Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb, with readings by Eileen Thalenberg in Yiddish and English. (Miles Nadal JCC, May 25, 4:30 p.m.) Poet-translator Chantal Ringuet presents her recent French-language anthology of Canadian Jewish writers with readings in English, Yiddish and French. (Beth David Synagogue, June 1, 1 p.m.)

Other presenters include Montreal Judaic Studies professor and editor Ira Robinson discussing the recent essay collection Canada's Jews: In Time, Space and Spirit (Temple Emanu-El, Wednesday May 28, 7:30 p.m.). Toronto author, publisher and genealogist Bill Gladstone (who writes this column) launches a new edition of A Basket of Apples, a collection of short stories by the late Shirley Faessler focusing on Jewish characters in Kensington Market in the 1920s and 1930s; the author's granddaughter, playwright-actor Karen Hines, will read selections from the stories. (Beth David, June 1, 3:30 p.m.)

Unlike the Academy Awards, the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards announces its winners weeks in advance, thereby relieving we staid Canadians of too much excitement and suspense. Still, it's always a great thrill to see literary excellence rewarded, which is why the community comes out in droves to support this event.

This year's fiction prize goes to Kenneth Bonert for his novel The Lion Seeker, which brings alive the world of South African Jewry in all its raw energy and ribald vernacular.

Other winners are: Ken Setterington for Branded by the Pink Triangle (Holocaust category); Frieda Forman for The Exile Book of Yiddish Women Writers (Yiddish); Josh Lambert for Unclean Lips (Jewish Thought and Culture); Anne Michaels and Bernice Eisenstein for Correspondences (Poetry); Albert Kaganovitch for The Long Life and Swift Death of the Jewish Rechitsa (Scholarship); Renee Levine Melammed for An Ode to Salonika: The Ladino Verses of Bouena Safatty (Bio/Memoir); Carol Matas for Dear Canada, Pieces of the Past (Youth); and Jeffrey Veidlinger for In the Shadow of the Shtetl (History).

The 26th annual Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards, celebrating excellence in Canadian writing on Jewish themes and subjects, will be handed out to the winning authors at a free public ceremony. Toronto Reference Library, Bram and Bluma Appel Salon, 789 Yonge St., May 27, 8 p.m.

Historic Plaques: Heritage Toronto and the Toronto Legacy Project are unveiling a historic plaque to commemorate three women of distinction – Amelia Earhart, Emma Goldman and Joyce Wieland. University College, Room 179, 15 King's College Circle, May 22, 11 a.m. Heritage Toronto is also unveiling a plaque in commemoration of the Jewish Old Folks Home (later Baycrest) as part of Jewish Heritage Month. Baycrest, 3560 Bathurst St., May 28, 11 a.m.

Arts in Brief

• The Lodzer Synagogue presents a screening of Nicky's Family, about Nicholas Winton, the British man who organized the rescue of 669 Czech and Slovak children just before the outbreak of World War II. 12 Heaton St., North York, May 15, 7 p.m. The Lodzer screens The Rape of Europa, about the Nazi looting of Europe, May 22, 7 p.m.

• The Canadian-produced film Shekinah – The Intimate Life of Hasidic Women, by director Abbey Jack Neidik, with Chanie Carlebach, opens this week in Toronto. It is at the Carlton Cinema and Elgin Mills Cinema, May 16 to 22.

• Shlomo Schwartzberg continues his series on Jewish-American filmstars with a look at the works of Barbra Streisand and Richard Benjamin. Miles Nadal JCC, Tuesday May 20, 1 p.m. $12 drop-in. 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

• Jewish Music Week in Toronto presents Afternoon Tunes – Abi Gezunt, a lively performance with Yiddish entertainer Stella Walker and Cantor David Rosen, featuring musical gems from Borscht Belt humour to cantorial works. Free admission. Miles Nadal JCC, Thursday May 22, 2 to 3 p.m.

At the Galleries: Prismatic, an exhibition of works by Leah Landau and Sandra Duba-Shubs, opens May 15, 6 p.m., with a reception at Atelier RZLBD, Bayview Village, lower level. Free admission, everyone welcome. The show continues thru May 29.

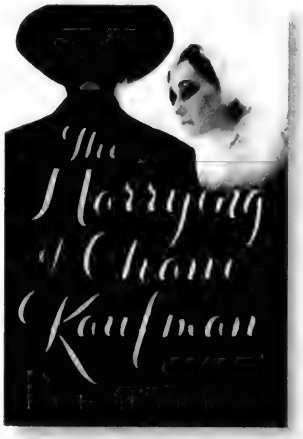
The lives of Jewish girls and women

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The recent election campaign in Quebec and its lead-up discussion of the Parti Québécois' "Secular Charter" placed an unusual amount of attention on popular opinion regarding the religious habits and dress of women. These discussions have plagued western European countries such as France and Germany, where they are often a cover for deeper discontent surrounding substantial immigration from North Africa.

In Montreal, no such recent immigration history exists, but there is a long history of confrontation in the city's Outremont neighbourhood, where myths associated with the area's essential Frenchness collide with a burgeoning chassidic population.

The finer points of Jewish religious life – the character of chassidic culture in contrast with other forms of modern Orthodoxy – are likely beyond the realm of public discussion. But publishers have spotted a niche subject with provocative potential, and in recent years have brought out a number of novels and memoirs by women, which aim to depict observant Jewish communities while addressing their relationship to mainstream culture.



The Marrying of Chani Kaufman
Eve Harris.

(House of Anansi)

Eve Harris' The Marrying of Chani Kaufman is the most recent among these. It garnered a large readership and substantial reviewer response in England, where it was first published. In Canada, House of Anansi, one of the country's prestigious independent publishers, will bring it out this spring.

The Marrying of Chani Kaufman operates on two levels, foremost as a kind of pop ethnography of the lives of Orthodox girls and women, providing a specifically English portrait by delineating the impact of class and education in varied London Jewish neighbourhoods. British reviewers, with their own particular attention to the English literary tradition, pointed to Harris' ability to transpose famous scenes from Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice to a contemporary Jewish context. Romeo and Juliet comes to mind as well, as another likely influence, as Harris' young would-be marrieds, Chani and Baruch, are set upon by the self-serving elders who would keep them apart.

The novel's second and arguably more serious subject is the potential for female independence and self-respect in rigorously religious communities. To address this subject, Harris introduces the Rebbetzin Zilberman, who is entangled with the novel's other characters but has a unique story of her own. The rebbetzin's family background is secular and detached from questions of Jewish identity, but a youthful year in Israel leads her to marry an equally adventurous partner, who, as the guiding figure in their marriage, turns her toward religious observance when the couple returns to London.

If the novel's attention to young Chani Kaufman's engagement and marriage is its comic side, the tale of the Rebbetzin Zilberman courts tragic outcomes. But it points, as well, toward what Harris views as the hopeful possibility of a woman who chooses to leave the commitments of family and community in favour of an undefined and new sense of freedom. Having abandoned her modest clothes and wig, the rebbetzin walks on the High Street of her familiar neighbourhood:

"The woman had stared straight through her. There had been no dawning of recognition, no greeting uttered. The Rebbetzin felt invisible, a ghost of her former self. She drifted on, perturbed yet relieved. Perhaps since she was no longer dressed in frum attire, she no longer existed for her community; they only saw what they wanted to see. In her jeans and loose hair, she was not of their ilk and therefore unimportant, merely another obstacle to negotiate as they progressed along the street. She may as well have been a lamppost. What a strange, blinkered world they inhabited."

Harris, unlike other writers who have approached these themes, has not left the fold, abandoned family, or chosen a secular life over religious responsibilities. As a child, she recalls her Holocaust survivor father rejecting faith. As an adult, she taught for a time at a private religious girls' school, and it is this experience that placed her near to the kinds of lives she portrays in her fiction.

One of the novel's flaws is its unwillingness to clarify whether it means to explore contemporary chassidic culture or the broader range of Orthodox communities. In one family scene we encounter a portrait of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, and on a couple occasions Harris favours the adjective "Hassidisher" to describe a character's behaviour. But the novel makes no effort to explain the meaning of such things (its glossary offers a definition of "Hasid" without relating the term to the novel's characters). In this way, Harris contributes to the vague unreliability of popular ideas associated with Jewish religious life.

Harris' British reviewers were not troubled by this. A glance at the web sites of London papers that reviewed the book reveals an indiscriminate use of photographs of both chassidic and non-chassidic Jews on London streets. It may be that the novel's publisher was aware of the book's open-ended approach, allowing reviewers and readers alike to feel, as did some writing for major London papers, that The Marrying of Chani Kaufman provided a generic portrait of "Orthodox Jewry."

Although Harris' novel offers a colourful and detailed fictional portrait, it risks contributing to the failed discussion of religious life among non-religious people, in which the latter group, reflexively, tells women in the former group they must change.

Political feminist groups expressed such views in the press as well as in political forums in Quebec during the past year. Although the PQ and its "Charter" were rejected, it was not clear that any greater understanding arose from an often dispiriting discussion regarding women's roles and religion. With its Romeo and Juliet-style standoff, The Marrying of Chani Kaufman can be read simply for fun. But its examination of women's rights and religious expression fails to address the particularities of Jewish communal life and the place of women in it. ■

Intimate portrayal of chassidic women in Quebec

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The world of Orthodox Judaism is not one we often see on the big screen. In Shekinah: The Intimate Life of Hasidic Women, a new documentary from Quebec, the lives of young women at a seminary come to the fore.

Taking its name from a word meaning "the female essence of God," Shekinah is a sensitive and insightful film. It explores the interactions between young chassidic women and the surrounding population who do not know what to make of their differences.

"There's wisdom in tradition," filmmaker Abbey Jack Neidik says, narrating, "but most of that old world is gone now." Neidik is fascinated by the Chassidim in his Montreal neighbourhood and wants to understand their way of life better.

Neidik follows young women who are Chabad Lubavitch as they attend the BMC Teachers' Seminary in Montréal. Their director, Chana "Chanie" Carlebach, lays out the ground rules on the first days. Be modest and cover your body – you are supposed to notice the person, not their shape. Seek profound truth in Torah and God, not the Internet. Dedicate your life to create a home based on the model prescribed in the Torah.

Shekinah examines the relationships Chassidim try to form with a non-Jewish community. When one of the students finds a swastika drawn on the seminary door, the women try to erase the negative feeling by spreading kindness, delivering food to nearby homes.

Despite the temptations around them, these women follow the teachings with honour and dedication. Neidik looks at how these spiritually intuitive young women react to concepts of love, marriage and relationships.

The students are pure and have profound thoughts about the world and their place within it, even if there is curiosity about the outside world. "When I was younger, I thought maybe [being Orthodox] was being repressed," student Rivkie Feldman tells Neidik. "It is so much easier to not be religious."

Near the film's end, the subjects of the film engage in a dialogue with local female high schoolers. "You have rules to follow and you respect them," one of them says, stunned. "We have too much freedom." These intersections between the chassidic women and the outside community comprise the best scenes in the film, bridging connections between cultures that do not normally intertwine.

If Shekinah falters on a narrative level, it is the lack of time we spend with many of the young adults at the seminary. The film follows the structure of their year there, from the first day of study until graduation. However, when Neidik explains how after spending a year covering these women, "they feel like family," his reflection does not ring true with the viewer, who only gets a limited glimpse at many of these girls.

The looks we do get are fascinating, especially the profound worldview of Chaya Mushka Stern, an 18-year-old woman from England trying to adapt to a rewarding lifestyle some may see as too rigid. However, Shekinah would be a more engaging film if it focused on more of these young women and their spiritual journeys.

Chaya Mushka Stern is an 18-year-old from England portrayed in Shekinah

> Shekinah is a fascinating exploration of a group not often explored in modern culture.

Nevertheless, Shekinah is a fascinating exploration of a group not often explored in modern culture. It is an especially significant film for Quebec audiences, since the misperceptions of some people around chassidic Jews may have spurred the recent controversy regarding the Quebec charter of values. ■

Shekinah: The Intimate Life of Hasidic Women opens in Toronto at the Carlton and Elgin Mills Cinemas on Friday, May 16, 2014. Additional play dates around Canada will follow in 2014.

THE REAL STORY

Walk for Toronto

David Levine

When tragedy strikes, communities band together, demonstrating support or rallying for change. The latest cause surging through Israel has been no different. It seems as though the whole country has united in pursuit of a larger goal.

Anat, 27, hitchhiked from Be'er Sheva to lend her voice: "Tragedies like these can bring out the best in ourselves. The values that unite us help us appreciate the things we have. I live in poverty, with no employment opportunities, but my sorrows pale next to the hardships of life under Rob Ford."

From humble beginnings protesting Toronto police's kettling policies, Toronto Mayor Rob Ford's steady regimen of misogyny, racism, homophobia and self-inflicted liver damage fuelled concerns for Toronto's citizens, and the protests grew. Following Ford's most recent* violent, hate-filled, crack-smoking rampage, the numbers surged to over 75,000 – and Walk For Toronto was born.(*"recent" at time of writing, statistically likely to have recurred before publication)

Organizers say they've managed to raise over $1 billion in support of the city of Toronto – though others call that figure "misleading," placing the number closer to $13,000.

"We stand with the people of Toronto," says Ehud, 21, who would only give his first name out of fear of Dixon City Blood reprisal. "In the 21st century, all citizens deserve the freedoms we take for granted."

Toronto's political landscape has been fraught with tension since the city's 1998 annexation of its surrounding neighbourhoods, pitting urbanites against suburbanites in a struggle for the soul of Canada's real capital – prompting accusations of institutionalized discrimination and mismanagement so fierce they have led many politicians to call for a return to pre-98 borders the so-called "Two City Solution."

"Was the original intention to create a second class of Toronto citizen? I don't think anyone would say so," says Nurit Bar-On, chair of Toronto studies at Bar Ilan University: "Still, the political decisions the city has faced raise questions, especially within the younger generation. Everyone's asking: 'Is this the Toronto my parents wanted me to live in?'"

Walk For Toronto organizers have no official stance on the Two City Solution. Some adhere to a vision of a unified Toronto, while others have begun boycotting all goods manufactured in Etobicoke. Nevertheless, they have come together to advocate democratic reform in Toronto, recently expressing their concerns in an open letter:

"Toronto continues to suffer under the reign of Mayor Rob Ford. Those with friends and family in Toronto have been following the story for months – originally to poke fun at our friends and family – but as the jokes have grown stale (looking at you, Kimmel), our tears of laughter have grown bitter. Now we hold our breath each day as we turn on the news, and dare to learn if Toronto has survived to see another cruel dawn.

"We cannot be complacent in the knowledge that Israel is a safe and civilized society – we must act in the name of human rights, and the right of Jews and gentiles around the world to live in a stable democracy where the rule of law is paramount.

"The need is urgent, the time is now. Walk For Toronto and raise awareness of Rob Ford's crimes!"

Most surprising, say organizers, has been the participation of several haredi groups – whose closed communities are normally unwilling to engage in political dissent. "Toronto deserves our attention and support," claims Nussun, a haredi demonstrator. "Toronto is a legitimate city with a legitimate government, and Bathurst Street is full of legitimate donors to our yeshiva. I'd enlist my son in the Canadian army in a heartbeat."

Programming Note: Bring the kids for an afternoon of anger, tension and child-friendly activities – from face painting and cotton candy to a whole midway of Rob Ford-themed games: Pin the Blame on The Media, Hide and Go Smoke, Whack-An-Aide and more! Have your picture taken with an actual Rob Ford supporter! (Constructive dialogue only, please refrain from open mockery). ■

FOOD

Shake it up on Shavuot

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Traditionally, the Jewish holidays revolve around food. Shavuot is considered by many to be the dairy holiday. There doesn't seem to be any definitive explanation for this specific tradition, but numerous theories have been offered. Perhaps it's because the Torah was given on the Sabbath, and no animals could be slaughtered for the meat to celebrate the event. Or could it be that during Shavuot in Israel, which is considered the land of milk and honey, grain is plentiful and cows are content, offering great quantities of milk.

Why not shake it up this Shavuot? Milkshakes make scrumptious snacks and desserts anytime, so it goes without saying that they make exceptional treats for Shavuot. This dairy indulgence can be a good source of nutrition, as it contains proteins, vitamins, minerals and carbohydrates. Milkshakes are also a very refreshing alternative to the traditional dairy desserts, such as cheesecakes, usually served on Shavuot.

Holiday Cake Shake

- ❑ 1 cup skim or low fat milk
- ❑ 1 cup yellow cake mix
- ❑ 4 cups French Vanilla ice cream, regular or low fat (See note)
- ❑ 2 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ sprinkles, for garnish
- ❑ 1 tbsp. light corn syrup, for garnish
- ❑ whipped cream – optional, but extra delicious

To prepare the milkshake glasses, first pour the corn syrup into one saucer and the sprinkles into another saucer. Then dip the rims of the glasses first into the corn syrup and then into the sprinkles, coating the rim of the glass. Combine the milk, cake mix and vanilla in the blender. Add the ice cream and pulse until smooth. Pour mixture into prepared glasses and top with whipped cream and additional sprinkles. Makes four servings.

Banana Split Sundae Shake

- ❑ 1 cup skim or low fat milk
- ❑ 1 ripe banana
- ❑ 1 cup pineapple chunks, well drained
- ❑ 1/2 cup maraschino cherries, well drained
- ❑ 4 cups Neapolitan ice cream (See note)
- ❑ 4 ripe banana slices, for garnish
- ❑ 4 maraschino cherries, for garnish
- ❑ 4 pineapple slices, for garnish
- ❑ chocolate syrup, for garnish

Prepare tall glasses by making a notch in a banana slice and pushing the slice of banana onto the rim of the glass, repeat with the cherry and the pineapple slices, placing them beside the banana.

In a blender, combine milk, banana, pineapple and cherries until smooth.

Add ice cream and pulse until smooth. Pour mixture into the prepared glasses and then drizzle the chocolate syrup over the milkshake.

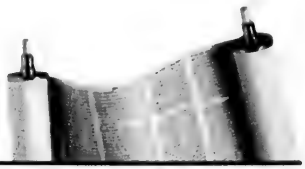
Milkshakes don't always have to be made with rich ice cream and topped with whipped cream to be yummy. When made with healthy ingredients like fresh fruit, including berries, bananas, peaches and pineapple, along with low fat milk and low fat ice cream or yogurt, milkshakes can become nutritious meal replacements.

So go ahead and bring out your blender, find some tall glasses and some wide milkshake straws, then follow these recipes for some rich, creamy, tantalizing dairy delightfulness this Shavuot.

Note: In all of these recipes, you can add either more or less ice cream/yogurt to the mixture depending how thick or thin you like milkshakes. ■

Parshah

Bechukotai | Leviticus 26:3 - 27:34



Rabbi Aaron Katchen argues God's promises in the Torah are national in nature
Rabbi Michal Shekel says we are shown a path forward, but not forced to take it
Rabbi Howard Morrison on the two categories of peace: external and internal

Aaron Katchen

"I will grant peace in the land, and you shall lie down untroubled by anyone; I will give the land respite from vicious beasts, and no sword shall cross your land."

This verse is from a list of blessings ending the Revelation-at-Sinai narrative. The promises therein depend on the Jewish People following God, and they're followed by a list of terrible outcomes if they abandon God's commands.

What's meant by sword? If you say a sword of war, God has already said, "I will grant peace in the land." Rather, it includes even a peaceful sword. The rabbis of the Talmud note the tension between the start of the verse, granting peace, and the end, which promises, "no sword shall cross your land." If there were peace, why would there be swords? They conclude the sword here isn't arising to bring war, but rather peace.

It refers to the demise of King Josiah in the time of Jeremiah the prophet. Josiah sought to return the Kingdom of Judah to the worship of God after the idolatry of his predecessors. He did much to remove idolatry from the Temple – so much so, he thought God's favour had returned and the prophecy would hold true – that even a peaceful sword shouldn't enter the land.

When the Pharaoh Necho sought to pass through the land to wage war on Assyrian idol worshippers, he tried to prevent Necho's "swords of peace" from passing through. Josiah died in battle, for God's favour had not yet returned.

God's promises in the Torah are national in nature. When there's a response to behaviour, it's due to the actions of the collective. With Josiah, he turned his own life around, but never completely inspired the rest of the nation to abandon idolatry. This stands as a reminder: how much of my energy is focused on bettering myself, versus how much do I focus on helping to better the community? ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen is associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Michal Shekel

A recently downloaded Scrabble app provides a feature appreciated by this weak player: a list of two-letter words that have proven quite useful in raising my meagre score. Who knew there were so many two-letter words – so obscure and yet so helpful?

A common two-letter word drew my attention in parshat Bechukotai, which begins with the Hebrew word im (if): "If you follow My laws and faithfully observe My commandments, I will grant your rains in their season" (Leviticus 26:3–4). If we do what God instructs us, much good will follow. If not, well, the bad things that will happen are also introduced with the word im (Leviticus 26:14). Superficially, Bechukotai is a list of rewards and punishments, a carrot-and-stick approach to our relationship with God.

Or maybe not: Rabbi Yitzchak of Berditchev suggests the reward for the mitzvah performed is the opportunity for additional mitzvot. Hence, the mitzvot leading to "rains in their seasons" allow for further mitzvot with the abundant harvest produced by the rain.

Pardon the pun but that little word im is "im"bued with so much meaning. Im is our human potential. There is no coercion. We are shown a clearly laid path, but are not forced to take it.

Bechukotai is not so much about reward and punishment as it is about a God who wants us to choose and choose well. As we count the Omer on our journey from Pesach's freedom to Shavuot's responsibility, we need to keep in mind the significance of that small Hebrew word im. Freedom is God's gift to us. Responsibility is our gift to God.

More than points on a Scrabble board, or a wealth of possibilities placed before us, the simple word im is an indication of God's faith in us. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

In a conventional non-leap year. Parshat Bechukotai is read in conjunction with the portion titled Behar. The fact this is a leap year and the two final portions of Vayikra are read separately brings back fond memories.

I celebrated my bar mitzvah in May 1973 at the Western Wall and read Parshat Behar on Shabbat morning. That being a leap year, the beginning of Bechukotai was read later in the day at the Shabbat Minchah service.

I will never forget that time in my life. It was my family's first visit to Israel. My parents, now of blessed memories, had never been to Israel before and used my bar mitzvah as the vehicle for having a family of six enjoy a two-week private tour of the country, culminating with my bar mitzvah at the Wall.

Both Behar and Bechukotai have much to say about commandments that pertain specifically to the Land of Israel.

At the beginning of Bechukotai, we read what appears to be a redundancy: "You shall dwell securely in your land. I will grant peace in the land." At face value, the two phrases seem to convey the same message.

Some classical commentators distinguish the two phrases in the following way: the first means Israel will have external peace with its non-Jewish neighbours. The second means there will be internal peace between diverse segments of the Jewish People.

Since the establishment of the State of Israel, we have witnessed the challenges regarding external peace as well as the challenges of sustaining a meaningful Jewish unity within the various ethnic and ideological groupings of our people.

Recently, we celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut. May the recent festivities inspire us to aspire for the day when Israel will see a lasting peace within the Jewish community and within the entire world around us. ■

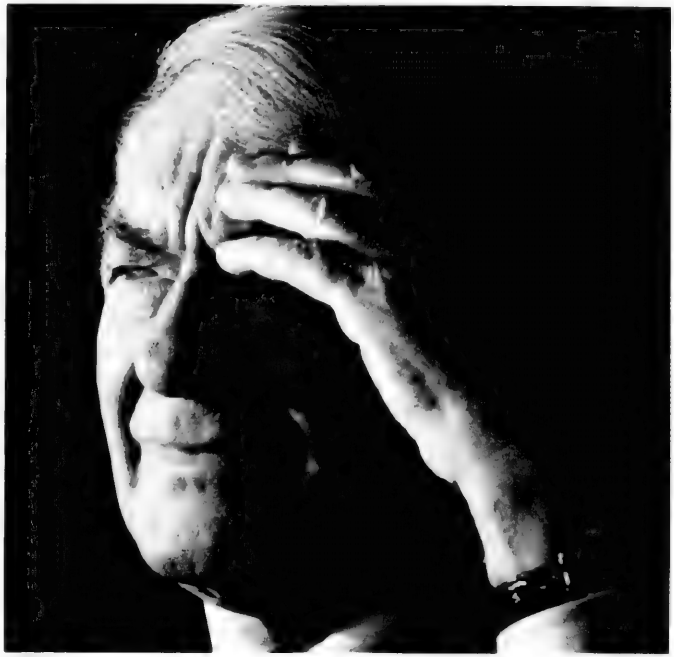
Claude Lanzmann: Returning to familiar territory

ELIAS LEVY
elevy@cjnews.ca

At 88, noted French intellectual, filmmaker, author and journalist Claude Lanzmann, who produced the classic documentary Shoah, has a new film that's a tour de force. His latest documentary, The Last of the Unjust, rehabilitates the tarnished image of a very controversial witness to the Holocaust, Viennese Rabbi Benjamin Murmelstein, the last head of the Jewish council (Judenrat) in the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

The masterful, poignant film, which runs three hours and 40 minutes, recently opened in Canada.

In an exclusive interview from Paris, Lanzmann talked about the film and the man at its centre.



Claude Lanzmann

Why did you decide to devote a long documentary to such a controversial figure of European Jewry during World War II as Austrian Rabbi Benjamin Murmelstein?

Benjamin Murmelstein was one of the first witnesses of the extermination of European Jews that I interviewed when I began my research for the film Shoah. He was the only head of the Jewish Council in the Theresienstadt concentration camp who was not assassinated by the Germans during the war. He was the last chair of the Jewish council created by the Nazis in that ghetto [as the Germans liked to call it] located some 50 kilometres from Prague. His two predecessors in that unrewarding job came to a tragic end: Jacob Edelstein of Prague, arrested in 1943 and then deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau and killed there, and Paul Epstein of Berlin, shot in the back of the neck in Theresienstadt in 1944.

At the end of the war, the Czech authorities and the leaders of the Jewish community – from which he was totally banned – accused Murmelstein of having been a "zealous collaborator in the pay of the Nazis." In 1945, he was finally acquitted of the charges brought against him, after he had served an 18-month jail term. He could never go to Israel, where he was also a persona non grata. He died in 1989.

What did you find most intriguing about Rabbi Murmelstein's very complicated character?

I really wanted to interview him, because I kept on asking myself what exactly a Jewish collaborator was. For me, there was a profound inherent contradiction in the very idea. I knew non-Jewish collaborators in France, in Belgium, in Holland... They totally embraced the Nazis' ideology and anti-Semitism. Everything negative and hostile I had read about Murmelstein, including in the works of a major Holocaust specialist, the late American historian Raul Hilberg, left me very skeptical.

> One thing is certain: it was not the obligation to remember that led me to make the film Shoah and other documentaries about that black period for humanity. We have been hounded a lot about the disappearance of the last witnesses of the Shoah. They are not all dead yet! And, when the last witnesses of that unspeakable tragedy have disappeared, at least one thing will remain – my films!

In Vienna, Rabbi Murmelstein was the only Jewish contact with the principal promoter of the Final Solution, Adolf Eichmann.

Yes, as chief rabbi of Vienna, Murmelstein found himself propelled, responsible for the Jewish community, charged with negotiating directly with Adolf Eichmann the emigration of the Jews of Vienna – a task he executed brilliantly because, thanks to his negotiating skills and his unwavering perseverance, 120,000 Jews were able to leave the Reich.

In your opinion, Rabbi Murmelstein was not a traitor, but a hero who used cunning rather than force to fight the Nazis.

Murmelstein's predecessors at the head of the Jewish council in Theresienstadt, Jacob Edelstein and Paul Epstein, agreed to themselves draw up the lists of Jews who were going to be deported. That led to horrible negotiations, haggling and privileges. Those being deported put great pressure on the Jewish council head to have him remove their names from the list he had just established. Murmelstein categorically refused to play the macabre game. He told the Germans, with an unheard of courage, "You want to deport us, go make your lists yourself."

The last witnesses of the Holocaust are disappearing. Was it the obligation to remember that motivated you to dedicate so many years of your life to documentaries about this horrible tragedy?

One thing is certain: it was not the obligation to remember that led me to make the film Shoah and other documentaries about that black period for humanity. We have been hounded a lot about the disappearance of the last witnesses of the Shoah. They are not all dead yet! And, when the last witnesses of that unspeakable tragedy have disappeared, at least one thing will remain – my films!

In France, high school teachers complain about the difficulty they have in teaching Arab students from the Maghreb (northwest Africa) about the Shoah. Are you aware of this problem?

It's not true! It's not difficult to teach the Shoah in French high schools. You just have to know how to do it. We have to train the teachers properly. I have been invited several times into schools reputed to be difficult, where the majority of the students are black or Arab students from the Maghreb. I showed the students my film Shoah, and then I spoke to them for about 20 minutes, basically to explain the difference between a concentration camp and an extermination camp. After having watched the scene with the hairdresser in the Treblinka camp, whom the Germans forced to cut the hair of women who were going to be gassed, several of the youngsters had tears in their eyes. They left this screening of scenes from Shoah with a mad desire to make films, too. There was not the slightest protest against my presence in those schools. On the contrary, I was welcomed very politely. ■

The Montreal interns' strike of 1934

Backstory

IRA ROBINSON

Quebec has just lived through an electoral campaign in which one of the key issues was whether Jews, Muslims and others wearing distinguishing religious clothing could serve in the civil service. To gain perspective on this, it's useful to revisit an incident that happened 80 years ago: a strike of French-Canadian interns against the appointment of a Jew as an intern at Notre Dame Hospital (NDH) in Montreal.

The Jew's name was Samuel Rabinovitch and he was a medical graduate of the Université de Montréal (UdeM). When Rabinovitch applied as an intern at NDH, in the hospital's words: "The council accepted all applications received from French-Canadian medical students. One alone remained on the table, that of a Jewish student. As there were still vacancies to be filled, the council recommended that the Jewish student's application be accepted." Several things are evident: Rabinovitch's application was handled separately because he was Jewish; applications from French-Canadians received preferential treatment; and NDH saw nothing wrong with filling an available position that had no French-Canadian candidates with Rabinovitch.

The French-Canadian interns saw things differently and demanded that NDH fire Rabinovitch, asserting that NDH must attain its manpower goals "without the help of foreign elements." They declared that they sought to "safeguard an institution that is at once Catholic and French-Canadian." Their concern was to defend against Jewish competition in an era when competition between Jews and French-Canadians in the professions was often fierce. NDH, at the strong insistence of Dr. Télesphore Parizeau, dean of UdeM's medical faculty (and, incidentally, the grandfather of former Quebec premier Jacques Parizeau), determined that it must stand by its contract with Rabinovitch. The strike was on.

The strikers asked interns at other Catholic hospitals to join them, and 75 interns at NDH and other hospitals walked out. The strikers were supported by French-Canadian physicians, the Société St-Jean Baptiste, and many members of the public, one of whom sent a letter to NDH stating that "the honour of the French-Canadians demands the exclusion of this stranger [whom] high finance sustains."

Amid harassment and threats of violence against Rabinovitch plus predictions of a boycott against the entire Jewish community, it became clear that Rabinovitch would have to resign if only, in the words of one Montreal Jewish community leader, "to extricate the hospital board from its difficulties in view of the fair treatment he had received from the hospital." His resignation was orchestrated to first be refused and only then accepted "so as to determine definitively that he was not dismissed as asked by the [interns'] ultimatum."

What was the strike's impact? Rabinovitch asserted that he had been "inundated" with letters, telegrams, and telephone calls supporting him and stated: "The majority of these communications came from French-Canadians who wished to dissociate themselves from the spirit of the action taken by doctors of their own race." A French-Canadian journalist said most French-Canadians disapproved of the strikers' actions that endangered patients.

There were no editorial opinions outside the openly anti-Semitic press that actually supported the strike. There were, on the contrary, strong French-Canadian editorial opinions against the principle of the strike.

While the interns gained their short-term goals – Rabinovitch's resignation and their own immunity – they lost their larger strategic goal of eliminating Jews from NDH's staff in principle, and they also failed to eliminate Jewish students at UdeM.

Valerie Stoker, writing on the controversy between French-Canadians and Chassidim over the public character of the neighbourhood of Outremont, captures the strikers' feelings as well. French-Canadians objecting to the Outremont eruv, Stoker asserts: "view Outremont's public image in the same terms as its physical territory... whose 'use'... had to be carefully monitored and apportioned... in the interests of protecting a dominant cultural community that is uniquely entitled to mark Outremont's landscape and shape its public image."

Sensitivities between French-Canadians and Jews constitute a continuing feature of the complex development of Montreal in the past 80 years. Now, as then, people in Quebec are speaking in multiple, oppositional voices as they strive to shape their future. ■

Guatemala dreaming, and Sterling puts foot in mouth again

Lev Tahor stuck in Canada, for now

The lawyer for Lev Tahor wants Quebec to lift a blanket apprehension order issued last year for all of the controversial haredi sect's 127 children. Guidy Mamann said the group only discovered it existed a few weeks ago, when some of the kids applied for passports and were denied the documents because of it. Officials in Chatham, Ont., where the group fled last fall, hadn't executed the edict. Mamann said the group is looking for a new place to live. Some members have already relocated to Guatemala. Meanwhile, Quebec's human rights commission said last week it will study whether child welfare and other officials there have the tools to deal with a case like Lev Tahor's in the future.

Magic takes high road

Earvin "Magic" Johnson said banned Los Angeles Clippers owner Donald Sterling's derogatory comments about African-American charity work won't harm black-Jewish relations. "One thing great about the African-American and Jewish communities is that they have worked well together over the years, and we will continue to work with the Jewish community," the basketball legend told the gossip site TMZ. In his first interview since the leaking of a taped conversation with a girlfriend in which he slanders blacks, Sterling told CNN's Anderson Cooper that he should get credit for his charitable work. "Jews, when they get successful, they will help their people," Sterling said. "And some of the African Americans – maybe I'll get in trouble again – they don't want to help anybody." The comments came after he apologized for his original remarks.

Magic Johnson stayed classy as Donald Sterling wallowed in the mud

New York Times editor ousted

Executive editor Jill Abramson, the first woman to hold the top editorial position at the New York Times, was abruptly fired May 14. The Times didn't give reasons for her departure. She was replaced by Dean Baquet, the managing editor, the first African-American to hold the post in the paper's history. Abramson, 60, joined the Times in 1997 from the Wall Street Journal.

Herb Gray deserved better

Michael Taube's perspective is mean, completely without merit, and suggests to me that he never met Herb Gray: a state funeral is the last thing on Earth that Herb Gray would have wanted, and anyone who knew him would certainly have known that ("Why Herb Gray didn't have a state funeral," The CJN, May 15).

I strongly suggest that Taube learns some basics with respect to the tone and tenor of written punditry. One is liable to get the impression that he is a partisan Conservative or a former speech writer for Prime Minister Stephen Harper rather than an informed political commentator who is to be taken seriously for his wit, wisdom, and insight.

Rabbi Arie Chark
Ottawa

Harper deserves support

In her column ("The great switch," The CJN, May 1), Danielle Kubes struggles to accept the reasons why Canada's Jewish community has embraced the Harper government in droves. Rather than celebrate Prime Minister Stephen Harper for naming Canada's first-ever Jewish Finance Minister, Joe Oliver, Kubes instead dismisses Canada's Jews as "neurotic."

According to Kubes, Harper has robbed the Liberal party of its God-given right to Jewish votes. Apparently he did this through "loud rhetoric" instead of "real action."

Really? In 2006, Canada was the first country to suspend aid to the Palestinian Authority after the terrorist group Hamas was elected. Was that just rhetoric?

In 2009, Canada was one of only 15 countries that boycotted the second UN Durban anti-racism conference, a cesspool of anti-Semitism. Was that just rhetoric?

Domestically, the Harper government cut off government funding to anti-Semitic organizations such as Palestine House – a move opposed by the Liberals.

The Liberals and the Conservatives are not the same when it comes to Israel. Liberal governments used to lend support to anti-Israel UN resolutions. Harper has not allowed that to happen even once. He has never accused Israel of committing war crimes, though we remember the Liberals who did.

In 2011, Canadian Jews rewarded Harper for his steadfast friendship and his principled leadership by supporting him in record numbers. It isn't neurotic to support your friends. It's neurotic not to.

Keeping Jews in the fold

I applaud The CJN for initiating a discussion on intermarriage ("The challenge of intermarriage," The CJN, May 8).

I share Rabbi Daniel Korobkin's concern for the future of the Jewish People. What frightens me is why communities and rabbis around the world don't recognize this as a crisis and passively accept this as "a new reality." Let's get at the root cause and figure out what is so appealing about marrying out of the faith. Why is it important to date Jewish? What strategies can we implement to ensure that the fifth son makes an appearance at the seder table in years to come?

Debbie Bauer
Toronto

Australian hero remembered

I was disappointed to note in the article "Gallipoli a solemn reminder of war," (The CJN, May 8) that no mention was made of General Sir John Monash. He was an Australian Jew who was born in Melbourne, Australia in June 1865, and was an engineer by profession and an artillery officer in the Australian army.

In 1914, he was in command of the Australian 4th Brigade in Egypt and experienced the Gallipoli fiasco.

He was revered by his troops because of the care he took in his tactical planning and the troops' welfare.

He was promoted to major general when Australian forces were moved to the Western Front in 1916, where he took command of the 3rd Division. In May 1918, after outstanding leadership, he was appointed corps commander of Australian forces in Europe. He was instrumental in many civic achievements after the war and was much beloved by Australians. His funeral was attended by 250,000 Australians and Monash University in Melbourne is named after him. ■

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.

Strive to be a mensch

Pirkei Avot teaches that even when surrounded by cruelty, we should remember we're all children of God and all who encounter us should feel touched by His greatness

Rabbi Splansky: "B'Makom she'ain anashim, hishtadeil lih'yot ish." "In a place where there are no human beings, strive to be human." (Pirkei Avot 2:5)
This text is a punch in the gut. I love it for what it demands and for what it doesn't demand. It's both realistic and unrelenting. Hillel looks humanity in the eye and does not pretend anything away. Human beings can be beastly. However, Hillel does not become a cynic. He doesn't say, "be human," he says "strive to be human." He recognizes that when surrounded by cruelty or callousness, it takes enormous strength to show even a hint of humanity. The only thing riskier than being human, is not being human.
A softer translation may be: "In a place where no one is acting like a mensch, be a mensch." For example, when in a social setting and the conversation turns to unkind words about someone, be big enough to gently but clearly signal disapproval and shift the conversation. Hillel warns against how dangerous circumstances can become when indifference goes unchecked. Schools now train our kids to defend against bullies. We need similar training for adults.

Rabbi Fishman: Hillel's call to human responsibility is both loud and clear. What's fascinating is there is a corollary to greatness that we find from another perspective.
"Akavia ben Mahalalel says: Consider three things and you will not come into the grip of sin: Know from where you came, where you are going, and before Whom you will give justification and a reckoning."
This Mishnah reminds us of a truth we sometimes forget: we're all children of the King. We all come from an honourable chain that casts us backward to greatness, a chain that connects us to a voice that calls upon us to act in such a manner that all who encounter us will feel touched by greatness.
This teaching is also future-orientated – know where you are going. How many of us forget to chart a course and have a goal in mind? By setting the expectations of our lives high, we will not fall into the sin of leading an unfulfilled life.

Rabbi Splansky: Your closing thought – "the sin of leading an unfulfilled life" – pointed me to the Mishnah's urging: "And greet everyone with a cheerful countenance." (Pirkei Avot 1:15) At first glance, it seems like a slogan for a greeting card in the "just because" section. But Shammai was no Hallmark card writer. Shammai is known for taking a hard line, for being impatient, for demanding respect for God and Torah. What does that stance have to do with a cheerful countenance?
The Hebrew phrase is "panim yafot," literally "a lovely face." It echoes the Torah's description of how God met Moses on the mountain – "panim el panim," "Face to face." Perhaps Shammai is teaching us that when we show our best face, we radiate something of the Divine out into the world.
I witness this every day in the face of the crossing guard in my neighbourhood. He's been standing on that corner for years – rain or shine, or 10 below, dressed in fluorescent yellow, holding a stop sign, and flashing the broadest smile you can imagine. The impact of how he greets every passerby with his "lovely face" is apparent. Everyone smiles, waves, and greets him with kind words in return.
To greet another, even a stranger, especially a stranger, is an act of faith, an expression of devotion to God. Like any other mitzvah, we must be deliberate and disciplined in projecting joy.

Rabbi Fishman: You write about permission to be gracious to one another. It's a powerful reality. I've found that there's so much we're unable to achieve because permission has not been granted. In our interactions with each other, so often there is a hesitancy to break the ice and "go first." And yet once "permission" has been granted, in whatever form it may take, people are only too happy to communicate and interact. Shammai's directive to greet others with a smile is just the tip of the iceberg: Behind a silent observer can sometimes be someone with much to say, but who isn't sure how to begin. ■

All must be included in our community

Over the next month, The Canadian Jewish News will be placing a spotlight on inclusion – the concept that people with disabilities should be accommodated without limitations – in a four-part series called "The Inclusion Project." This venture coincides with a community forum on inclusion in Toronto on May 26, and a conference entitled Current Trends in Pediatric Neuro-Developmental Disabilities on May 26 and 27 (for more information about those two events, please see page 8).

In the field of education, the inclusion theory advocates that students of all levels and abilities be encouraged to study together, and that those young people who may have more difficulty in school because of a disability not be marginalized. Inclusion argues that the disabled have been pitied for far too long, and that's not what they want.

Just ask Talia Soberano, 31, a preschool teacher at the Zareinu Educational Centre in Toronto, who explains why inclusion is so crucial in this week's cover story. Diagnosed with dyslexia, memory retention issues, reading and writing comprehension challenges, mild OCD and ADHD at an early age, Talia experienced first hand how young people with special needs were once treated as outsiders, especially in education.

"In elementary and middle school," she writes, "I remember leaving my class to receive help from remedial sources and feeling like everyone saw me as being different."

Things only got more difficult in high school, where Talia experienced a dreadful trauma: "I was having trouble in most of my courses," as she tells it, "and was definitely not on the road to success. One afternoon, I was called into my guidance counsellor's office and told to sit down.

"She pulled out my high school transcript, looked at me through her thick glasses and said I should 'drop out of school and find a job at McDonald's.' She said I had no academic future and that I should give up.

"I left her office in tears. I was so ashamed that I did not tell my parents for days. Her words haunted me. I dropped out of school shortly after, feeling worthless and defeated. I went into a state of depression and stayed in bed for days at a time."

That trauma might well have derailed Talia's life. Instead, it only made her more determined to succeed in spite of the roadblocks facing her. From her diagnoses, she writes, "I didn't just learn about my weaknesses – I also learned about my strengths." Among those strengths, as it turned out, was working with special-needs children, a vocation she found herself passionately called to.

In The Inclusion Project, reporter Sheri Shefa writes about emerging treatments for those with special needs, organizations that are leading the inclusion movement and even financial planning for families of children with disabilities.

And in the spirit of inclusion, we asked Talia and three other people living with disabilities to write about their experiences, in their own words. By telling these stories, their hope, and ours, is that they won't be repeated.

As Talia puts it: "I fell through the cracks of the educational system. I wanted to make sure that didn't happen to others." ■ — YONI

PERSONAL REFLECTION

In his death, an escape from slavery

Dan Horowitz

In what could only be described as the extreme "good news, bad news" scenario, April 24 was my birthday. It's also the day my beloved father died.

While most of my friends and acquaintances were sending me "Happy birthday" messages, my family and I were making funeral arrangements.

And, while many of those same individuals expressed their condolences, I, not normally considered a "glass-half-full" kind of guy, have in fact, taken solace and comfort in that fact.

You see, my father, Carl Leonard Horowitz, who was 86 when he died, had been given a death sentence some 13 years earlier when he was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease.

Dad knew how much all of us wanted him to be released from the "life" that this once nimble and graceful athlete found himself "living," a life lived in the confines of a wheelchair, behind a locked door, unable to speak to or remember the people who cherished this wonderful man for decades.

This was not a "life" that anyone who had a say would ever choose.

And although an estimated 500,000 Canadians have Alzheimer's disease or a related dementia, and that in just five years, this number could rise by 50 per cent, this was not something that was supposed to happen to my family.

Even after he was diagnosed, my dad refused to believe that he would – or could – ever forget the names of his kids, grandkids or wife. After all, he had finally retired not long before the disease hit, and it was time to enjoy the spoils he had earned after all those years of hard work as a pharmacist in Mississauga, Ont., in the eponymously named Carl's Pharmacy.

"I don't think I'm Alzheimerish, although I may have to think about it in the very near future," he wrote in a letter to his family years ago. "Then again, if I fight it and think positively, maybe I could conquer this Alzheimer fellow. It would be a pleasure to laugh at him and say goodbye."

Unfortunately, despite those brave and optimistic words, nobody's laughing at Dr. Alois Alzheimer, the man who, in a meeting in 1907 in Germany, presented the monumental findings for which he will, ironically, be remembered.

The case was of a 51-year-old woman whose symptoms included depression, hallucinations, dementia and, upon post-mortem examination, a paucity of cells in her cerebral cortex and clumps of filaments between the nerve cells.

Still, it took my father some 13 years since his diagnosis, with his family looking on, to finally give in to the ravages of this unrelenting, cruel and brutal disease, and I believe he held out that long for one simple reason: he wanted to wait until Passover had ended before, well, passing over.

Dad loved leading seders with our family crowded around the dining room table. Hell, he loved any excuse to bring his family together. And up until he got sick, he would often lead those seders in his fluent Hebrew. He loved going around the table and asking us what Passover meant to us, and often, we'd surprise him by not answering, "It's around the same time the Leafs are eliminated from the playoffs, Dad!"

You don't even want to know about our take on the Four Questions.

Even when he knew that Alzheimer's had started to change him, he joked to me that "if this thing ever gets a hold of me, I won't be able to hide the afikoman anymore, because I'll forget where I hid it."

I believe his death mirrors the Passover story, in particular our escape from slavery into the light of freedom – our Exodus. Today, I believe my dad is at peace, his memories of his beloved family fully intact once again as they were before this devastating disease took them from him. I believe, too, that he is now free, his once limber and athletic body no longer a prisoner of his wheelchair or the locked doors of the facility in which he spent his last eight years.

Every year on April 24, I will not only celebrate my birthday with my wife and my two beautiful children, but, more importantly, I will recall my dad's incredible legacy, as well as his own personal exodus. After my family sings the requisite Happy Birthday to me, I will sing the same silly songs that my dad sang to me five decades ago to my son Eli and daughter Shira, so that they'll know the man that Zaidy Carl really was, the man they never got to meet.

I will continue to show them photos and tell them my favourite memories of the man who was once my best friend, a man of infinite jest, infinite wisdom, infinite intellect and, of course, infinite and unconditional love.

And, next year I will hide the afikoman, albeit without Dad's usual flair and humour, and I will pray that, unlike my dad, I will never forget where I put it. ■

'I didn't just learn about my weaknesses, I also learned about my strengths'

The Inclusion Project: First of four part series

TALIA SOBERANO
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In Grade 1, I was diagnosed with learning disabilities. My teacher asked me to read a page from a book. She quickly noticed that I had memorized the page and was simply repeating it, not reading. Subsequent testing ensued to identify the problem.

I have very specific memories of being tested in small rooms throughout my childhood to identify various types of challenges. The exercises always left me feeling as if I had to perform to prove my worth. In addition, the experiences were always stressful and caused me anxiety, which sometimes interfered with the outcomes of the actual tests.

From a very young age, I recognized I was different from most of my friends. I was eventually diagnosed with dyslexia, memory retention issues, reading and writing comprehension challenges, mild obsessive compulsive disorder (OCD) and attention deficit hyperactive disorder (ADHD). From these diagnoses, however, I didn't just learn about my weaknesses – I also learned about my strengths. I quickly learned I was a "people person" with good social skills, a problem solver who could function well in high-pressure situations, a highly organized person and someone who could meet the goals I set out for myself. These realizations enabled me to see things from a different perspective.

In elementary and middle school, I remember leaving my class to receive help from remedial sources and feeling that everyone saw me as being different.

It was not until Grade 13 that things began to change. I was having trouble in most of my courses that semester and was definitely not on the road to success. One afternoon, I was called into my guidance counsellor's office and told to sit down.

She pulled out my high school transcript, looked at me through her thick glasses and said I should "drop out of school and find a job at McDonald's." She said I had no academic future and I should give up. I left her office in tears. I was so ashamed that I did not tell my parents for days. Her words haunted me, and I dropped out soon after, feeling worthless and defeated.

I went into a state of depression and stayed in bed for days at a time. My parents were at a loss and didn't want to push me too hard.

I recall that my stepmother, Lila, came into my room one day when I was crying. She forced me to stop and really think about what I wanted to do with my life. I realized that working with children was the right career path for me.

I fell through the cracks of the educational system. I wanted to make sure that didn't happen to others.

I finished my two-year college program in a year and a half. I then applied to go on a two-week program to teach in some of the most basic schools in rural Jamaica. There were hundreds of applicants for this program, and I was selected as one of 20 students to attend. On the first day, I walked into a school that was no more than one room divided by three rolling chalk boards. There were 100 little students inside.

I met a five-year-old boy named Raymond and noticed that he was not learning and could not retain information. When I approached his teacher, I was told he would never learn and I should help the children who could. In that instant, I knew my goal there would be to work with Raymond and show his teacher that, with the proper support, he, like any other student, could learn.

I finished my early childhood education program that year and began studying at Concordia University in Montreal, pursuing a bachelor of arts in child studies. The program focused on education, with an emphasis on special needs and physiology. I finished this three-year program in 2-1/2 years, again surpassing my own goal. After Concordia, I was awarded my bachelor of education and my master's in teaching from Griffith University in Australia.

I consider myself lucky. I had a strong support system, with people who believed in me – and I had determination. If I were to give others in my situation any advice, it would be to make sure to always work hard for what you want, as most things worth attaining in life don't come easily.

I would encourage parents with children who have special needs to support their kids and let them know how proud they are of them and their accomplishments, however small. With appropriate support and encouragement, and the right tools, there are no limits to what children can learn and do.

I am proof of that. ■

'Never stop dreaming,' says dad of child with special needs

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

When Kalman Samuels and his wife, Malki, founded Shalva, an Israeli organization that helps children with physical and developmental disabilities, 24 years ago, all they knew about caring for children with special needs was what they had learned from caring for their own son, Yossi.

Yossi was 11 months old when he became deaf, blind and hyperactive following a routine vaccination in 1977.

Little did they know that this would set them on a course to create a program in Israel that has benefited thousands of children and their families.

Samuels, a Vancouver native and a father of seven, will share his story next week at a two-day conference on Current Trends in Paediatric Neuro-Developmental Disabilities, organized by Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, Shalva and Hadassah Medical Centre in Jerusalem, to be held May 26 at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan.

His lecture, titled "Empowerment of the child with chronic disability: my personal experience," will focus on his journey caring for his son, and how he and his wife developed a centre that is considered a leader in the field of disability awareness and intervention in the Middle East.

Speaking to The CJN from his home in Jerusalem, Samuels explained that his ordeal began the day his wife took Yossi for a routine vaccination.

"There was a problem with this batch, because a number of children were injured. As soon as he got the vaccine, he had a terrible jerking motion and he became lethargic, and when I came home from my studies that night, Malki was hysterical."

Upon confirmation that the vaccine was to blame and that Yossi would not recover from his injury, they decided to go to New York, where they enrolled him in a world-renowned school for the blind called the Lighthouse.

"Malki struggled with Yossi, who came home every day at 1 p.m. as a three-year-old, and her day was over. Literally, everything focused around that child. We were there for almost five years. There was some progress, but not a lot... We decided that in spite of it all, we didn't have much of a life over there," he said, and they decided to move back to Israel.

He said many well-intentioned people suggested that they institutionalize Yossi.

"Malki used to cry and say, 'God, I didn't take Yossi anywhere except from you, and I'm not giving him away. If you ever decide to help Yossi, I will be dedicating my life to other mothers with their problems with their children.'"

Samuels said when they returned to Israel, they enrolled Yossi in a school for the deaf in Jerusalem.

When Yossi was eight years old, a deaf special education teacher named Shoshanna Weinstock taught him to spell using symbols, with a technique reminiscent of the one Annie Sullivan used to teach Helen Keller to communicate.

"It was an amazing moment when she went ballistic, and she came in screaming in her deaf intonation, 'He's got it! He's got it!' And his life was forever changed," Samuels said.

"Malki turned to me and said, 'It's payback time. I made a promise and I know exactly what I want to do to help people.'"

With a $50,000 donation made by an old friend in Vancouver, the Samuels opened Shalva in 1990. Shalva, which means peace of mind in Hebrew, began as an after-school program with 10 kids.

"Little could we have dreamed that this little mom and pop would continue to grow in this really amazing way."

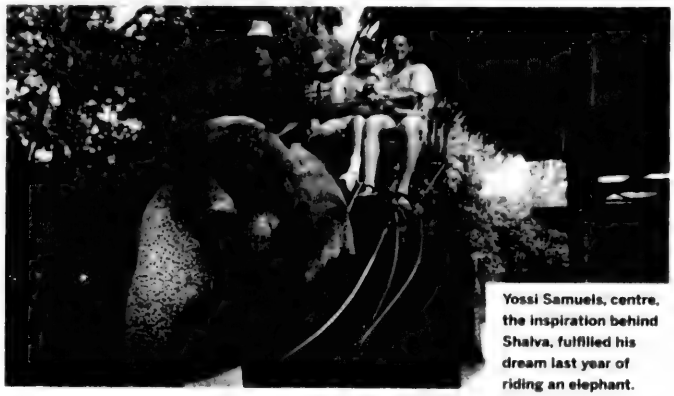
Shalva, funded by the Israeli government and private donations, currently operates out of an 18,000-square-foot building and provides services to more than 500 people with special needs from infancy to adulthood through programs and round-the-clock therapy, run by professionals and volunteers. Samuels said about seven years ago, the Israeli government granted them land upon which to build a national Shalva centre.

"We are in the midst of a $50-million project, which will be 200,000 square feet, 11 floors, with amazing facilities... It'll be a centre for inclusion in which typical and non-typical kids will be studying together and playing together."

Samuels said that the Shalva programs benefit both the children with special needs and the parents who struggle to cope with giving their children the proper care.

He said the biggest challenge in raising children with special needs is training yourself to look at your child's accomplishments through the eyes of the child.

"It is not your journey as a parent, it is your child's journey. You have to stop looking at this child with your measuring stick. Because with your measuring stick, he doesn't measure up too well," Samuels said.



Yossi Samuels, centre, the inspiration behind Shalva, fulfilled his dream last year of riding an elephant.

"My sister was a well-known psychologist in Canada, and she said, 'He's not the problem, you are. You're still dreaming he's going to be a rabbi. You're still dreaming you're going to play ball with him. He's not going to be a rabbi and he's not going to play ball. But that doesn't change the fact that his life can be full of accomplishments... So wake up. Smell the coffee.' I cried like a baby. And it took me years and years of awareness to try to do that."

In spite of his disabilities, Yossi, 37, continues to realize his dreams, Samuels said.

Yossi dreamed of meeting former U.S. president George W. Bush and former British prime minister Gordon Brown, and he met them both, in 2007 and 2012, respectively.

Yossi, who rides horses, dreamed of riding an elephant, and last year, he travelled to Thailand to realize that dream.

Samuels said when he saw a photo of his son on an elephant, he broke down in tears.

"The message for me is to never stop dreaming and not to give up on realizing your dreams. Yossi doesn't." ■

Rise of Europe's far right is worrisome

Paul Michaels

In the midst of all that's been said and written over the past few weeks about Russia's annexation of Crimea and threat to the rest of Ukraine, it's ironic to see both Russian and Ukrainian leadership boast about protecting Jews while blaming each other for endangering them with anti-Semitism.

Jews, who have historically suffered terrible persecution in both countries, have now become, in effect, a litmus test of each side's virtues.

Last week, The CJN's Sheri Shefa reported Ukrainian-Jewish community leader Joseph Zissels' comments to the paper during a visit to Toronto. Zissels maintained that, contrary to Russian propaganda and despite some isolated incidents, Jews are not being victimized by anti-Semitism in Ukraine and that the country has reformed – a process that started decades before the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.

Zissels even claimed that the far-right Svoboda party, (now part of the Parliament) has, in recent years "completely moved away from anti-Semitic propaganda," although he did admit that individual members of that party have posted anti-Semitic comments on their personal blogs.

On CBC Radio's The Current (May 8) host Anna-Maria Tremonti interviewed Robert Singer, CEO of the World Jewish Congress, about events in Ukraine and elsewhere in Europe. Referring to the recent bloodshed in Odessa, she opened with the following: "Europe's upheaval is terrifying on many levels, but one community in particular knows how much is at stake in instability: Jewish people worry that the mayhem might nourish old hatreds. Already, some political parties [across Europe] with anti-Semitic platforms can count on new support."

While Singer backed up Zissels' comments about Ukraine and the Svoboda party, he said the WJC is keeping close watch on events there that affect the 300,000-strong Jewish community. These events, including some isolated anti-Jewish "provocations," which the police are investigating, "keep everyone worried." Yet, "there is no alarm, at least not now." He also mentioned that there's been no discernible increase in anti-Semitism in Russia.

Tremonti questioned Singer about a 2013 WJC publication titled Neo-Nazi: The Rise of neo-Nazism in the Party Political System.

"What are you looking at?" she asked.

"We're extremely worried that, almost 70 years after the end of the Second World War, neo-Nazi and right-wing parties are coming to power in many places in Europe, the very place where the Holocaust of the Jewish People happened," Singer replied.

He pointed specifically to Hungary, Greece, France and even Germany.

In Hungary's election last month, he noted, the far-right, anti-Semitic Jobbik party rose in the past three years from 17 to 21 per cent, whereas, only 10 years, ago it had just two per cent of the vote. "This means that over 1 million voters in Hungary voted for Jobbik… Having this situation in the centre of Europe only 70 years after the Holocaust worries us tremendously."

Tremonti: "Essentially, what are you witnessing here – that the neo-Nazi gangs are finding legitimacy in political parties?"

Singer: "That's correct." He added that the same is happening in Greece with the rise of the Golden Dawn party, and even in Germany with the NPD Party.

What also concerns Singer is that, with European elections taking place later this month, several members of these extreme right-wing parties could get seats in the European Parliament. In fact, Singer claims, "15 to 25 per cent of the European Parliament will come from right-wing parties in Europe."

The reasons for the growth of the radical right vary from country to country, Singer said, but mainly boil down to two main factors: a reaction to the economic recession, unemployment and tough austerity measures, especially in Greece; and anti-immigrant sentiments, especially in France.

Last month Reuters issued a special report about the rise of the European far-right, fuelled in particular by Jobbik's "regional outreach," which has spread to Poland, Slovakia, Croatia, Bulgaria, and even to Britain, forging ties with Nick Griffin's British National Party.

Little wonder Singer is worried. ■

Israel and the 'free' press

Leo Adler

As in most democracies, Israel's print media are stuck between a rock and a hard place.

In order to survive, they must not only compete against each other, but they are also compelled to fight, on the one hand, against the growing proliferation of "free" newspapers and, on the other hand, against the increasing strength of broadcast and social media outlets.

In short, they feel that they're dying.

And, according to various members of the Knesset, their death throes are primarily due to the incredible financial clout of an American, right-wing casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, whose free, pro-Netanyahu Israel Hayom newspaper has been gnawing away at the circulations – and political influence – of the more traditional journals.

For that reason, the MKs have introduced a bill in the Knesset that would forbid the distribution of "free" newspapers and set a minimum selling price for all papers.

There are numerous issues that flow from any such law. The most obvious concerns are government control of the media marketplace and freedom of the press, and of expression more generally.

Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, in a recent article criticizing the proposed legislation, pointedly said that the "government should have no right to tell the publisher of a newspaper how best to compete, how to maximize his political impact, how to earn a profit… or how to run his or her business."

However, his is an American perspective superimposed on the Israeli situation.

As Canadians, we know all too well the difficulties of trying to maintain a distinct political culture, ethos and perspective, one that thrives, that does not permit money to "maximize… political impact" and that's reflective of our diversity. That's why, unlike the United States, Canada – and indeed most democracies – have rules that both restrict and promote political spending and political campaigning.

While this had led to the curiosity of Canadians partially paying for the campaigns of the separatist Bloc Québécois and Parti Québécois, it also ensures that all voices, once they achieve a certain level of acceptance, can be heard.

And, contrary to what Derschowitz claims, these laws have not led to tyranny, and certainly not the tyranny of allowing money to prevent more than two viable political parties to exist.

One can, therefore, sympathize with the Knesset's desire to somehow control spending that originates from a foreign-based, unlimited source and that threatens to lead to the demise of those other political voices that simply cannot match Israel Hayom's cash resources.

In fact, Canada, too, when faced with challenges to its cultural icons, has stepped in to either protect or nurture Canadiana.

Whether it be through ownership rules, content regulations, subsidies or the creation of Crown corporations, Canada has seen to it that – at least for a while – the fiscal and regulatory prowess of Parliament has been used to counter-balance foreign (and almost invariably American), pervasive influences.

The proposed Israeli bill does smack more of crude political gamesmanship rather than the articulation of a policy based on the protection and promotion of Israeli political and cultural values.

However, the rationale for the legislation, from a Canadian perspective – namely that money cannot, and ought not, buy political success – is one that is supportable, albeit in a more refined manner. ■

Public punishment for private views

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Our sages teach that we are to be cognizant that hovering over us is "a seeing eye, hearing ear and that all our deeds are written down in a book." While our sages were referring to God, modern technology has allowed this teaching to also refer to us humans created in His image.

Privacy is being eroded all around us, and the distinction between private and public life has been blurred beyond recognition. The Talmud greatly valued the right to privacy – for example, one was not allowed to have a window overlooking a neighbour's backyard. In the 10th century, Rabbeinu Gershom of Mainz declared that all who read the mail of others without permission – and there's no reason why this should not include email – shall be excommunicated. A decree of excommunication meant complete ostracization, including denial of burial rights in a Jewish cemetery.

I thought of this as much of the media's attention was focused on Donald Sterling, the owner of the Los Angeles Clippers who expressed racist views in a private conversation that was recorded illegally and unbeknownst to him.

The outrage was immediate and the announced punishment swift: a $2.5-million fine, a lifetime ban from the National Basketball Association, and being forced to sell his team. That Sterling held racist views was actually quite well known, and he therefore is a person you may want to shun. But to strip a person of his property for expressing such views, even if they're expressed publicly, is excessive punishment. It may be morally offensive, but it's not illegal to hold racist views. What is illegal is acting on those views – and in fact, Sterling has previously been fined for refusing to rent apartments to blacks.

Jewish law takes the prohibition of lashon hara, negative speech, very seriously. And in Judaism, moral wrongs are often much more serious than legal ones. Damaging a person's reputation is worse than eating pork, but Jewish law calls for a human (as opposed to Divine) punishment only for actions – we do not punish views, no matter how vile. One can perhaps choose not to do business with such a person, and even to impose communal sanctions, but one may not actively try and take their business away. Inflicting financial punishment on someone is a most serious matter – the Bible uses the same word, damim, to refer both to blood (life) and to money.

Our politically correct society is perfecting the art of meting out public punishment for private views. The law societies of Upper Canada (Ontario) and Nova Scotia recently voted to deny graduates of the soon-to-be-established Trinity Western University law school (TWU) the right to practise law in their provinces. This is in response to the requirement that TWU students and staff sign a "Christian Community Covenant" agreement that forbids "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman." That society can marginalize what was once the norm to such a degree should be frightening to all who value individual rights and freedoms.

And in a further sign of lack of tolerance for dissent, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau has announced that his party will no longer allow anyone who opposes abortion to run for office under its banner. It weakens us all when people are excluded because of a position on a controversial subject about which there is little broad consensus.

Democracies thrive when they encourage a diversity of views, even and especially if they're views we strongly disagree with. And while we must strongly protest vile views, such protest must be done constructively. It is by having to debate views that run counter to our own that we sharpen, refine and even change our own.

Jewish law rules that when a court unanimously declares guilt without at least one person arguing for innocence, that person must go free. When we shut off dissent, we can never attain complete truth. ■

Learning from death

Norma Baumel Joseph

Death can be a wicked teacher. Right at the moment when one is grappling with the pain of loss, the reality of and desire for life asserts itself. Filled with both intellectual and emotional complexities, death forces us to confront the contradictions and lessons of living.

Assailed by memories both good and bad, we can be overwhelmed with the present. There are so many daily requirements that pull at us exactly when we want to retreat. Drawn to think about the past and our loss, we need to live in the now, while refusing to accept the inevitability of final endings.

With my mother gone, I feel bereft, still waiting for some more time with her. "Wait, I have some questions to ask." But she's not here and I have to go on living, planning for a future in which I am now the matriarch. Additionally, I have to deal with the cumbersome issues of funerals, estates and taxes. I resent the intrusion of these details on my mourning.

Grief needs to be expressed, and in my experience, it takes time and concentration.

Perhaps this is where we can see the genius of the Jewish rites of shivah. These rituals slow down the process of facing life and death and enable a moment to enshrine both the pain and the joy. Seven days dedicated to introspection and memory, a time removed from the usual distractions. Paradoxically, shivah and the following months of Kaddish aid the process of returning intact to life, to the present.

How does one remember a lost loved one? Sharing stories of a life well lived, crying over the bad times, seeking the humorous, we need this mechanism. So shivah gives us a moment in which we can avoid reality and live in the tenuous world of grief. It allows the self-indulgence that's necessary, then gently nudges us on our way to real-time living.

Somehow, we begin to cope with this longing for the past, living in the present and striving for the future.

Barbra Streisand sang a song that expressed these sentiments poignantly. "Between yesterday and tomorrow there is more – there is more than a day." When someone dies, we look back in time. Seeing fullness cut short perhaps or just longing for some more time, a few more memories. Yet, we continue our future-oriented planning. What happens to the now? Today is a very elusive time frame, but it determines the reality of our lives. How do we celebrate the present and maintain our focus on it? The notion of today is certainly more than a day. It's a fleeting moment that requires full attention and a dedicated sense of significance for the now of existence.

But living in the now doesn't come easily. Again I find insight in Judaic notions. The concept of hakarat hatov, recognition of the good, is very useful if difficult to maintain. It is usually used to refer to a kind of gratitude. We should be grateful in the very moment that life is transpiring. Right now, I'm breathing, writing, thinking – all actions that take place in the present and for which I should be appreciative. I need to acknowledge the fullness and basic goodness of life even in the face of mourning and loss. It's difficult.

Moreover, while this imperative of gratitude shouldn't be limited to specific experiences or people, it does help to recognize those who do good.

In that vein, I want to acknowledge some very good deeds. Recently, in Quebec, a group of volunteers and rabbis worked diligently to release a woman from the bonds of her dead marriage. The rabbinic court of the Vaad Ha'ir of Montreal deserves special recognition. They issued a seruv (a contempt of court order) and wrote letters. Vigils were held. One distinct community co-operated. Right before Passover, she reclaimed her life.

Thank you all. ■

Global poll finds 'persistent, pervasive' anti-Semitism

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) has released a report on global attitudes toward Jews, and it found that anti-Semitism remains "persistent and pervasive."

The ADL Global 100: An Index of Anti-Semitism surveyed 53,100 adults in 102 countries, including 505 in Canada. It found that "more than one-in-four adults, 26 per cent of those surveyed, are deeply infected with anti-Semitic attitudes. This figure represents an estimated 1.09 billion people around the world."

People were asked to respond to 11 questions about Jewish loyalty to their home country, whether Jews care only about themselves, whether they have too much power in the business, media and political realms, and whether they are responsible for starting wars. Those who responded negatively to six or more questions were considered to hold anti-Semitic attitudes

Among the Canadians surveyed in July 2013, the ADL found that 14 per cent harbour anti-Semitic attitudes, which translates into 3.8 million people nationwide.

That clearly puts Canada below the international average, but not as low as other democracies such as Sweden (four per cent); Netherlands (five per cent); United Kingdom (eight per cent); and the United States (nine per cent).

At the other end of the spectrum, 93 per cent of the population in the West Bank and Gaza hold anti-Semitic views, while Iraq is close behind at 92 per cent. Other Arab countries like Yemen, Algeria, Morocco, Libya, Tunisia and Jordan have numbers ranging from 81 per cent to 88 per cent.

So, as far as Canada is concerned, is the glass half full or half empty?

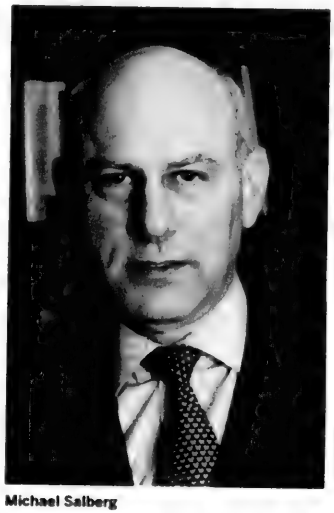
According to Michael Salberg, director of international affairs for the ADL, the Canadian results are similar to those found in other English-speaking countries, in which findings of anti-Semitic attitudes are relatively low.

"It is heartening," he said in a telephone interview from New York. "When you look at the global figure of 26 per cent versus the English-speaking countries at half that, there is something there, whether it's a longer, more developed history of democratic institutions or a robust Jewish community presence.

"There is a social and political culture of disapproval of discrimination and an openness to diversity," he said. "Those kinds of elements play a crucial role. There's a willingness to discuss and be open to the possibility that society has faults that need to be addressed.

"We find that when the political, civic and religious leaders are willing to condemn acts of discrimination, prejudice versus people, especially anti-Semitism versus Jews, it has a positive impact and the message gets through to society."

Steve McDonald, associate director of communications for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the ADL methodology was sound and its findings significant.



Michael Salberg

"It's always disappointing to find beliefs in anti-Semitic conspiracy theories and that Jews only care about themselves," he said.

Despite his overall positive analysis of the Canadian responses, Salberg acknowledged there were some puzzling findings. Overall, younger people in the 18 to 34 cohort harboured fewer stereotypes about Jews than Canadians in the 35 to 49 age group and those over 50. But when questioned about whether Jews are more loyal to Israel than to Canada, 32 per cent thought they were, close to the 35 per cent response among those 50+. Globally, that was the most commonly held stereotype about Jews, held by 41 per cent of respondents.

In Canada, 21 per cent of younger respondents also thought Jews have too much power in the business world, compared to 19 per cent of 35-49-year-olds and 27 per cent for those older than 50.

The overall "index score" tabulated by the ADL, based on all 11 questions, found only seven per cent of Canadian young people held anti-Semitic views, compared to 20 per cent among the oldest demographic cohort.

Noting young people's attitudes to Jews in business and their loyalty, Salberg said the findings "need to be looked at more carefully in Canada by Canadians."

Senior CIJA officials have met to discuss the results and are formulating a plan to respond to the findings, McDonald said. "It's disturbing to think that young people with access to all the information in the world and who are more likely to have met a Jew" would hold some of these views, he said.

"You would expect them to be more tolerant.

"For us, it's a sobering reminder of the importance of being more innovative in communicating the horrors of the Holocaust and the dangers of anti-Semitism," McDonald added.

"What we've learned in more than 100 years of dealing with anti-Semitism and combating hatred and bigotry is that the only meaningful, long-term response is education," Salberg said. ■

Shaar Shalom hires rabbi, opens door to egalitarianism

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After a year without a rabbi, Shaar Shalom Synagogue has hired a new spiritual leader, opening the door to egalitarianism after four decades as a traditional Conservative congregation.

This summer, Rabbi Steven Schwarzman will leave his pulpit at Congregation Beth Israel in Worcester, Mass., to lead the 400-family synagogue in Thornhill, Ont. The 53-year-old was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary in 2008, after a prior career as a technical writer and trainer for an Israeli software company.

Janice Shachter, president of Shaar Shalom, told The CJN that the congregation changed its constitution this past February, following a vote that passed by 86 per cent, to allow for the possibility of concurrent egalitarian and traditional Shabbat services, and also to guarantee the continuation of traditional services.

Any changes will be based on member demand, and will follow a process led by the new rabbi, Shachter said. "There's room for everyone. Conservative Judaism is a pluralistic Judaism."

Shachter is optimistic about the future of Shaar Shalom, despite challenges it has faced in recent years. In 2009, for demographic reasons, the shul's Hebrew school closed.

More recently, in October 2012, the executive and board of governors opted not to renew the contract of longtime spiritual leader Rabbi Martin Berman, who had led the congregation since 1994. Three months later, Rabbi Berman sued for wrongful dismissal. The case was settled out of court in March 2013, and he remained the shul's spiritual leader until last July, working full-time until May.

As well, a number of members left last year amid uncertainty about the shul's future. Six years ago, there were 600 member units, 50 per cent more than today, and in 2012, there were 550.

Shachter noted that there are now some new members with young children, a positive development when many congregations are struggling with aging memberships. With an average age of 61, Shaar Shalom skews lower age-wise than some of its Conservative counterparts in the GTA, she added. She's hopeful that some members who have left the shul will rejoin.

Rabbi Steven Schwarzman

Those who stayed, she noted, have "a real feeling of passion" for Shaar Shalom. While Cantor Ben Silverberg continued to carry out pastoral duties following Rabbi Berman's departure, members also stepped up to lead services and organize study groups on a volunteer basis, Shachter said.

The interim time served as a bonding experience that brought people together, she added. "We need a rabbi. But considering we didn't have one, we really did make the best of it, and managed to thrive and prosper."

Rabbi Schwarzman, who is beginning a two-year contract, shares Shachter's take. "The amazing thing to me," he said, "is not that the shul has gone through a bit of a rough spot. That's not so uncommon. The amazing thing about Shaar Shalom is the energy they've displayed... There's a vibrancy that you feel in the air. People are really excited about the shul... That kind of energy is something you can really build with."

Rabbi Schwarzman and his wife Bettina, a Hebrew school teacher, will move to Toronto with the youngest of their four children. The three oldest will be in Israel – one for a post-university year, the other two as olim following in their parents' footsteps.

The rabbi, a native of Washington, D.C., met his Stockholm-born wife, the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, as a graduate student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. They lived in Israel for almost a decade before relocating to the United States.

In his spare time, Rabbi Schwarzman is collecting stories for a book he's writing about favourite Jewish prayers, a subject he stumbled onto by raising the topic while waiting for a minyan to begin. ■

Entrepreneurs launch farm guided by Jewish principles

ILAN MESTER

Castanea Collective isn't your typical farm. For starters, the Peterborough-based collective is a CSA, which stands for community supported agriculture.

Kevin Karl, one of three founders of Castanea, says a lot of these types of farms are relatively anonymous these days. However, his collective stays closer to the concept's roots.

"They can just be kind of like a vegetable delivery service and you never really have that interaction with the farmer or really get the sense of what's going on in the fields," he says of today's CSAs.

"I think it's important to try to get people out there so that they can see what's going on, have a connection with the seasons, and have a stronger sense of where their food is coming from."

Each week, members of Castanea Collective receive a basket of vegetables that change depending on the season.

"With a CSA, you're going on a seasonal eating adventure and it's a way to strengthen that connection," adds co-founder Russell Vinegar.

"You can't be part of a CSA and be totally ignorant about what it is you're eating and how the seasons work because you're going to be talking to us every week."

Vinegar and Karl met at McGill University where they studied agriculture and environmental sciences. While at university, the duo, along with a third friend, Sebastian Belliard, were already brainstorming projects they could collaborate on.

"The ball was rolling with ideas of what we could do, what our common interests were and just keeping an eye out for opportunities for land," Vinegar says. "I guess this was just the right time, the right place and here we are."

It all started last year when Karl, who had already worked on Brazilian and American farms, returned to Canada to take a course in Peterborough. He invited Vinegar and Belliard to launch a farm and together they connected with John Nicholson, a local musician and landowner.

"He's been waiting for someone to do something interesting with the land, or something that he felt good about," Vinegar says. "He turned down some conventional farmers in the area looking to rent it over the years and it was only in December that we were really connected with him and lined that up. It's left us with lots of work."

> The challenges are practically endless because they're working on land that hasn't been farmed before

The challenges are practically endless because they're working on land that hasn't been farmed before, the trio needs to develop the entire infrastructure, plan the irrigation strategy, etc. They even had to build their own greenhouse. "We're coming at it pretty much from scratch," Vinegar says.

He adds that a Birthright trip last year – where he got to visit a kosher winery – inspired him to introduce Jewish principles into his farming, including the concept of shmittah.

"The underlying principle is giving the land time to rest and restore, and maintain its fertility," he says. "For us, that's making sure that you're rotating where you're growing – that you're not growing the same thing in the same place every year. [This prevents] diseases [because] you're not drawing the same nutrients."

Karl says they've also borrowed a social action concept from Judaism. He points to a passage in the Torah that says when you harvest, you should leave the edges and the corners for the less fortunate.

"Often, the price makes [food like this] inaccessible for a lot of people," he says. "A lot of what we're trying to do is to figure out how we can meet people where they are, how we can make the food as accessible as possible."

In response to that the trio has introduced a sliding scale, which means members of their CSA can choose three different price points. "We hope that people who can pay at the higher end do and people who can only pay at the lower end do that," Karl says.

Down the line, the friends hope they can teach people how to integrate food production into their everyday lives. One of their goals is to build up a stock of edible perennials that members can plant in their own backyard.

"I think our ultimate goal is to establish these long-lived food production orchards that will keep feeding people long after we've left," Karl adds. "That's one of our driving focuses."

Mount Sinai to merge with Bridgepoint

Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Mount Sinai Hospital, left, along with Jay Hennick, chair of Mount Sinai's board, stand on University Avenue in front of the renowned medical facility.

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Mount Sinai Hospital and Bridgepoint Active Healthcare have signed a memorandum of understanding that will see the two medical institutions merge to provide a more seamless treatment experience for patients.

In addition, a partnership with Circle of Care, a Toronto-based home care provider, will allow the three health organizations to provide treatment from the acute care phase to rehabilitation to support for patients once they return to their homes.

"The proposed amalgamation with Bridgepoint is an extraordinarily exciting growth opportunity for Mount Sinai Hospital and is a testament to Jewish community leaders who founded this great hospital over 90 years ago," Jay Hennick, chair of Mount Sinai's board and Joseph Mapa, the hospital's president and CEO, said in a statement.

"Building on a strong heritage, the proposed Sinai Health System will support our vision to grow our hospital and lead the health-care sector with excellent partners, such as Bridgepoint – a highly respected leader in complex chronic care and rehabilitation, and Circle of Care – a leading provider of home care and community-based services."

They added: "As a Jewish-founded hospital, we continue to go from strength to strength, thanks to the unwavering support of our community. We hope this community will continue to feel pride in Mount Sinai's accomplishments as we work toward offering our patients an integrated and co-ordinated care experience and setting new standards of excellence in patient care."

According to a message to stakeholders from Mapa and Marian Walsh, president and CEO of Bridgepoint, located in the Riverdale area of Toronto, "the proposed amalgamation would see Mount Sinai and Bridgepoint come together to create one new organization on two campuses – Bridgepoint at the corner of Gerrard Street and Broadview Avenue, and Mount Sinai Hospital, Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Health Complex, on University Avenue.

"Each campus and legacy organization would retain its existing brand and its distinct identity, and we will bring together the overall system under the newly created 'Sinai Health System' banner."

The hospitals are currently seeking regulatory approvals while setting out more detailed planning to complete the merger. The process is expected to be completed by the end of the year. ■

Two Torontonians set to excel in Israel this summer

Birthright Israel Excel names its first Canadian participants

By Daniel Horowitz

Two Torontonians have been selected as the first Canadian students to take part in Birthright Israel Excel, an innovative program for students who combine academic achievement with social responsibility, the desire to succeed in the world of business and, as is the cornerstone of all Birthright Israel initiatives - strengthen their connection to Judaism and the State of Israel.

Daniele Gordon Richie Chaikof

The Taglit-Birthright Israel program, supported by the Charles & Lynn Schusterman Foundation, the Steinhardt Family Foundation and the Paul E. Singer Foundation, will bring 40 accomplished Jewish students to Tel Aviv at the end of May where they will intern for 10 weeks with some of Israel's most exciting companies, gaining invaluable experience and making vital contacts that will help them in their future careers. Birthright Israel Excel participants will also meet with a myriad of Israel's political, business, technology and philanthropic leaders.

The two pioneering Torontonians – chosen out of more than 100 Canadian applicants - are Richie Chaikof, a 21-year-old graduate of CHAT's Wallenberg Campus, currently in his third year at Western University and his first year at the Ivey Business School, and 19-year-old Daniel Gordon who recently completed his second year at Queen's University in the Commerce program.

The pair, who will be heading to Israel on May 31st, will be joining 38 other participants selected from across the United States.

"It's definitely an honour to have been selected to this very exciting program and to represent Canada, and, of course, Toronto," said Chaikof. "I had applied for other programs and summer jobs, but Birthright Israel Excel appealed to me because it makes me part of a network with many others, some of whom will hopefully be North America's future business leaders. We're all staying together, in a residence in Tel Aviv, which is wonderful. I can't wait to meet them."

Chaikof, who for now wants to give investment banking a shot, will spend his ten-week internship with a major bank in Tel Aviv.

"I am eager to establish business and personal networks during the summer and continue to bring Israel innovation to the forefront of business discussions when I return to Canada," said Chaikof. "I want to join a network of young Jewish professionals and am seeking to broaden the engagement of North American businesses with Israeli commerce. That's the most amazing part about the fellowship; participating in world-class global business in the context of our Jewish homeland."

As for Gordon, May 31st simply can't come fast enough.

A graduate of TanenbaumCHAT in Vaughan, Gordon, a participant on the 2011 March of the Living, is not only excited about gaining invaluable business experience and contacts, but doing it in Israel.

"Being chosen for Birthright Israel Excel is such an exciting opportunity, and one that I am so grateful for," said Gordon. "The fact that through Excel I have an internship in the financial services industry, which is something I'm looking to go into, in Israel, is tremendous. It will be great to get a feeling for Israel's business sector and it's well known entrepreneurial drive."

And, as someone who continues to advocate for the Jewish state, Gordon feels the time in Israel will better prepare him to continue to advocate, albeit with a different slant.

"In my opinion, the best way to advocate for Israel, especially when dealing with non-Jews, is by focusing on Israel's positive contributions to the world-at-large, and certainly two of her biggest contributions are in technology and business. It's amazing when you realize how much Israel has accomplished in these areas, considering the fact that they are surrounded by many countries they can't even do business with. I hope that this program will give me better insights as to how to better promote Israel, while teaching me leadership and communication skills which I will be able to transfer over to my future career, and even now, at school."

Excel is an extension of Taglit-Birthright Israel, which sends Jewish adults between the ages of 18 and 26 on a 10-day trip to Israel to strengthen each participant's Jewish identity. Taglit-Birthright Israel aims to build an understanding, friendship, and lasting bond with the land and people of Israel and to reinforce the solidarity of the Jewish people worldwide. Taglit-Birthright Israel is funded through a historical partnership between of the people of Israel through their Government, private philanthropists (Birthright Israel Foundation of Canada) and local Jewish communities around the world (in Toronto, through UJA Federation).

"We are thrilled and proud that Richie and Daniel were given the opportunity to join this elite program," said Elizabeth Sokolsky, VP of Education and Operations for Taglit Birthright Israel, North America. "We hope that we will be able to secure the necessary funding in Canada to expand the number of Canadian participants in the future".

GUEST VOICE

Get involved in the provincial election campaign

Stephen Adler

On June 12, voters in Ontario will go to the polls to elect the province's 41st legislature. While federal elections tend to generate more interest, in many ways provincial elections have a greater impact on the daily lives of Ontarians – including members of our community.

Many would be shocked to learn that tens of thousands of Jewish Ontarians live in poverty. Indeed, our community includes a large number of at-risk individuals, such as children from low-income households, seniors (including Holocaust survivors), new Canadians, and those challenged with disabilities. Their quality of life depends on receiving essential services from provincially funded programs, which Jewish communal agencies access.

In the face of budget constraints facing governments in general, it's critical that we make a strong case for the value of well-funded ethno-specific service providers such as Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS), Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and others. This is why the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has assembled a coalition of interfaith and inter-ethnic partners speaking with one voice to ensure continued funding for our community agencies. Community-based agencies can deliver unique, client-focused services, which, for various reasons, governments cannot deliver as effectively or efficiently.

For many in our community, one issue continues to be top of mind in the lead-up to Ontario elections: provincial funding to alleviate the costs of day school tuition. We acknowledge the apprehensions Ontarians have toward the funding of faith-based schools. While such concerns tend not to be directed toward the Jewish community, we understand that Ontarians are wary of funding faith-based schools that might adhere to lower standards than those of the public system or, worse, include curricula contrary to Canadian values.

We believe the next provincial government should consider ways in which it can better support a variety of schools outside the public system. This is particularly the case when it comes to essential public services that have nothing to do with religious curricula. Day school students with identified special needs do not qualify for the same services that they would receive in the public system. A student in need of speech and language therapy, to cite one example, should enjoy the same access to services regardless of whether they attend public or private school. Unfortunately, this is an unfair discrepancy that continues to prove costly for those families having no choice but to make up the difference out-of-pocket.

Whatever issues are most important to your family, our collective voice will only be heard through active engagement in the democratic process. Despite our relatively small size, our community has always had an impact beyond our numbers. Moreover, we are a community large in geography, with active communal leaders across Ontario. I encourage readers to contact CIJA's local leadership in the GTA, Ottawa, Hamilton, or in other areas via the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario. For details on getting involved in local advocacy efforts, visit www.cija.ca.

In addition to voting, I encourage you to get involved beyond the ballot box. Meet your local candidates and let them know your priorities. If you feel strongly about a particular party, but have never taken an active political role, consider volunteering, attending a campaign event, putting up a lawn sign or donating to your local candidate. You will be doing your part to uphold our community's long tradition of civic engagement. ■

Young professionals partner with Chai Lifeline

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Michael Grossman

It is never planned, and when it happens, it is always a shock. A child is diagnosed with a serious illness or has special needs.

Families can be torn apart, daily routines can be disrupted, financial devastation can result if one or both parents miss work for extended periods of time.

To help raise awareness of these kinds of problems, a group of young professionals has partnered with Chai Lifeline Canada to organize Conspire 2 Inspire, a fundraising event set for May 29 at the Burroughes Building, 639 Queen St.W.

"Conspire 2 Inspire was born with the intent of having every young professional resonate with this organization, and know of the important... work that Chai Lifeline does," said Michael Grossman, lead chair of Conspire 2 Inspire.

"Thirty-five committee members have been working tirelessly on their own time to make a difference to our kids and our families. These are our future leaders, and it is inspiring to see them engaged in a way that is so meaningful," said Craig Fried, director of development for Chai Lifeline Canada, an organization that provides support to more than 200 Canadian families who have children with serious illnesses or other disorders.

"The organization is personal for me, as, a couple of years ago, dear friends of mine had their youngest child diagnosed with a serious illness," Grossman said.

"It is very important to me that Chai Lifeline becomes a recognized charity within the young professional demographic. My friend had to quit her job. Her husband had to leave town in order to take a job earning more money."

The organization helped the family in many ways, Grossman said.

"From paying for her numerous parking bills at the hospital, providing meals when she was too exhausted at the end of the day to even lift a finger for her other children, providing babysitters, tutors, and even carpool services for her other children, Chai Lifeline provided incredible assistance," he said.

Chai Lifeline has more than two dozen programs and services to help ease the almost insurmountable difficulties of caring for a sick child or one with ongoing special needs. Many services are provided free of charge.

The organization can offer financial support for medical expenses, counselling for each member of the family, Big Brothers and Big Sisters who bring an extra measure of adult attention to the children's lives, tutoring for children who miss school for extended periods of time, family retreats, sibling programs and two summer camp programs.

> Chai Lifeline has more than two dozen programs and services to help ease the almost insurmountable difficulties of caring for a sick child or one with ongoing special needs.

Fried will attend the next Conspire 2 Inspire committee meeting to provide two options of where the funds raised can be directed to provide the greatest impact.

"This is very exciting and personal for us – to choose where the funds raised from Conspire 2 Inspire will go," Grossman said.

The event is expected to attract some 400 young professionals, and will feature great music, dancing, a kosher sushi bar, and a burger bar with a barbecue on the rooftop patio. Everyone will go home with a swag bag full of goodies.

"We anticipate raising tens of thousands of dollars. Our goal is to have the children of Chai Lifeline be the winners at the end of the day," Grossman said.

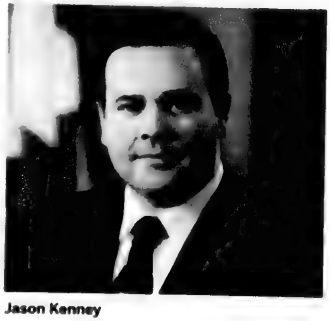
UN Watch to honour Kenney for 'moral courage'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca



Jason Kenney

Hillel Neuer well remembers the lead-up to the 2009 Durban Review Conference, the UN anti-racism followup parley popularly known as Durban II. Durban I, which was held in South Africa some years before, had degenerated into what many critics termed an anti-Semitic hate fest. With then-Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad scheduled to address the Durban II delegates in Geneva, right across the street from the offices of the organization he heads, UN Watch, Neuer expected a similar festival of anti-Israel agitation.

But in January 2008, more than a year before the conference was scheduled to proceed, the government of Canada said it would not participate. Canada's lead in boycotting the conference was followed by about a dozen democracies, including Israel and the United States.

Taking the lead in announcing Canada's boycott, was Jason Kenney, then minister of citizenship and immigration.

"It was a seminal moment for us at UN Watch," said Neuer. "Canada took the moral lead."

In recognition of Kenney's role in that event, UN Watch was scheduled to present Kenney with its Moral Courage Award at a May 22 event in Geneva.

"It's for people who take a stand, and Jason Kenney has taken a stand on the true principles of the United Nations – human rights – which we are trying to safeguard from the political blocs trying to distort the meaning of human rights," Neuer said.

Last year's winner was Shin Dong-hyuk, the only known surviving escapee from a North Korean prison camp.

Speaking on the phone from Geneva, Neuer said Kenney has been a consistent voice on the world stage speaking against anti-Semitism and bigotry.

He also commended Kenney and the government of Canada for speaking against Richard Falk, former UN special rapporteur for Israel. When Falk spoke at the UN and called for UN Watch to be investigated, Kenney rose in Parliament to defend UN Watch. He called Falk a 9/11 conspiracist, said he was "a disgrace" to the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) and he called on the UN to fire him.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who was also highly critical of the Durban conferences, applauded Kenney's role as "a leader both in and outside of the Canadian Parliament on issues of respect for multiculturalism and diversity, the combating of racism and anti-Semitism, support for Israel's right to live within secure and recognized boundaries free from any threats or acts of force, and support for fairness and due process at the UN, including combating the singling out of Israel for discriminatory treatment while giving human rights violators exculpatory immunity. We have been close colleagues and friends for some time, and I have been proud to work with him in common cause across party lines."

A tribute page posted online by UN Watch included congratulations from Canadians of Vietnamese, Burmese, Pakistani, Uyghur, Chinese and South Sudanese descent. In addition, a message from the Dalai Lama noted Kenney's support for Tibet and for "the rights of oppressed people around the world."

UN Watch was also scheduled to present its Morris B. Abram Human Rights Award to Iranian dissident and author Marina Nemat, who now lives in Canada.

Nemat was jailed and tortured as a political prisoner in Tehran at age 16.

"UN Watch is honouring Marina Nemat for her brave and outstanding work worldwide in bearing witness to the horrific crimes perpetrated against her by a regime that continues to assault, jail, torture, rape and execute human rights defenders, religious, ethnic and sexual minorities, and thousands of other innocent men, women and children," said Neuer, who's marking 10 years as UN Watch's executive director.

Previous winners of the prize include Russian dissident and chess champion Garry Kasparov; Massouda Jalal, the first woman in Afghanistan to run for president and to serve as minister for women's affairs; and Esther Mujawayo, an activist for victims of the genocide in Rwanda.

Also last week, UN Watch condemned the UNHRC's "bizarre, nepotistic, and politically driven" decision to name Hilal Elver as special rapporteur on the right to food. Elver is Falk's wife. Her appointment came the same day he ended a six-year term as UN special rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories. ■

Libeskind team will design monument

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

Canada's National Holocaust Monument is one step closer to being built after the government's announcement of the winning design, to be erected adjacent to the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

The winning team, chosen over five others, includes renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, artist-photographer Edward Burtynsky, Quebec-based landscape artist Claude Cormier and University of Toronto Holocaust scholar Doris Bergin. Team leader will be Gail Dexter-Lord, co-president of Lord Cultural Resources, which also consulted on the Museum of Human Rights in Winnipeg and the 9/11 Museum in New York City.

The announcement was made May 12 by Canadian Heritage Minister Shelly Glover, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and Multiculturalism Minister Tim Uppal, whose private member's bill – the National Holocaust Monument Act, Bill C-442 – was responsible for the chain of events leading up to the announcement.

The monument is scheduled for completion in the fall of 2015. Its design features a large gathering space for ceremonies with room for 1,000 people enclosed by six triangular, concrete segments to create the points of a star, reminiscent of the yellow stars that Jews were forced to wear during the Holocaust.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) was actively involved in advancing the National Holocaust Monument from its earliest stages, working with MPs from all parties to secure unanimous support for Bill C-442. Funding for the project will come from both the Jewish community and the federal government.

CIJA chair David Koschitzky acknowledged the collaboration. "We thank the members of the National Holocaust Monument Development Council, ably chaired by Rabbi Daniel Friedman of Edmonton, and the government of Canada for their diligence in bringing this project yet another step closer to realization. Special thanks are due to the Hon. John Baird and Heritage Minister Shelly Glover for their efforts in advancing this project," he said in a statement.

Once completed, Canada "will no longer be the only Allied nation without a national Holocaust monument," CIJA noted.

"In bearing witness to the Holocaust, the monument will be a compelling reminder of the dangers of unchecked evil and the enduring imperative to confront all manifestations of anti-Semitism and hatred," it said. ■

How to end infighting among kosher certification agencies

Nafatli Bennett offers a solution, but will kashruth organizations go along with it?

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

In his book Kosher, Private Regulation in the Age of Industrial Food, American author Timothy Lytton recounts an old rabbinic joke featuring two mythical creatures created by God at the dawn of time: the Behemoth, a giant ox, and the Leviathan, a giant fish.

In the joke, a rabbi explains to his students that at the end of days, when the Messiah arrives, there will be a feast and God will slaughter the Behemoth to feed the entire world. The Leviathan will also be slaughtered at the same time, and it too will be used to feed the entire world.

"But rabbi," one of his students asks, "if the Behemoth can feed the entire world, why also slaughter the Leviathan?"

"Because there will be those who won't believe the Behemoth is kosher, so they will be able to eat fish," the rabbi answers.

Clearly, disputes over kashrut go back a long way – and if there's any truth to the joke, the Messiah's arrival might not resolve the matter.

Lytton, a professor of law at Albany Law School, told The CJN that the current certification system in North America, in which a handful of big players effectively dominate the market, developed as a result of widespread corruption and uncertainty in the kosher food market in the early days of the 20th century.

Things then were so bad that people had no confidence that the food they might consume was actually kosher. Many kosher-observant Jews simply stopped eating meat, because they did not trust any certification.

Standards began improving 50 or 60 years ago, and today, industrial producers of all sorts of foods eagerly seek out kosher certification for entry into a desirable market.

But rivalries among certification agencies can have a negative effect, Lytton writes.

"Personal animus and institutional rivalries can skew judgments about reliability. Information networks and supply-chain influence can be used to poach clients and stifle competition.

"Too many rivalries and accusations can spill over and create a public perception and a consumer response that is bad for both sides."

Kosher certification agencies, are "hostages of each other... If the competition gets too bad or nasty, it tends to degrade the reputation of kosher supervision overall. If the nastiness gets bad enough, the history of kosher certification suggests it will be bad for the public reputations of all the certifiers. There's a long history in kosher certification of rabbis running each other down, and if they do it in public, the public won't trust any of them," he said.

One solution to infighting among certification agencies is being considered in Israel.

Naftali Bennett, the country's economy and trade minister, who also serves as minister for religious services, recently announced plans to introduce a three-tier system that aims to make certification easier for restaurants and their patrons.

Naftali Bennett

According to The Times of Israel, Bennett's system would award food-producing establishments with one to three stars, indicating their level of adherence to Judaism's dietary laws.

"Each business or company can decide how many stars it wants," Bennett said.

The new approach would also revise the system of funding for certifications. Currently, food establishments pay for their own supervision, a practice that has drawn criticism for creating potential conflicts of interest for inspectors. The new reform proposes a third-party body that would handle the financial side of the kashrut supervision.

The Times of Israel reported there was plenty of criticism of the new government plan. Shahar Ilan, deputy director of Hiddush, an Israeli non-profit organization that promotes religious freedom and equality, said Bennett's arrangement would maintain the state rabbinate's monopoly over the kashrut system instead of opening it up to the free market.

He called on authorities to encourage kashrut liberalization, including non-religious, Reform, and Conservative kosher certifications, enabling consumers to choose to be kosher according to their own beliefs.

Lawrence Lax, a kosher consumer and an addiction counsellor by profession, has his own suggestions about reforming kosher supervision in Toronto. He suggests that the Kashruth Council of Canada, which administers the COR hechsher and is known by that name, faces "a conflict of interest" in its operations – though different than the one centred on the way mashgichim are paid.

"On the one hand, they have to be of service to the people they work with in the food industry," Lax said. "On the other hand, they have to make it possible for us to have kosher food at good prices."

He suggested that COR should use its market clout to negotiate better prices for meat.

Lax also suggested COR should transition into a community service organization; that it "age-out senior salaries" when older employees retire; and turn over most mashgiach services to young men coming out of yeshivas who wouldn't command large salaries.

COR declined to answer The CJN's questions. It published an "Open Letter to the Jewish community" in which it described itself as being "dedicated to serving our community.

"COR is a not-for-profit organization and all fees collected go towards covering our operations and providing services to the community. In the food service division (i.e. restaurants and caterers) we actually operate at a financial deficit – our expenses are greater than our fees. We are able to marginally compensate for this loss from our other divisions. Customers choose COR because they know that we are reliable, we provide professional service and our prices are in line with the other major kosher certifiers," COR's open letter stated.

Timothy Lytton

COR, however, has adopted the practice being criticized in Israel – it permits restaurants, caterers and suppliers to employ mashgichim directly, though they report to COR and are under the supervision of COR personnel.

Moti Bensalmon, a spokesman for Badatz Toronto, a kosher certification agency founded in 2008, said, "the conflict of interest whereby a mashgiach is paid directly by a business is finally going to end in Israel. Any agency allowing mashgichim to be paid by ownership loses its credibility in today's world."

Referring to other Israeli proposals for reform of its kashrut certification system, Bensalmon rejected the idea of a three-tiered approach.

"I believe a three-tiered system is bad here and in Israel. What we need to strive for is a solid one-tier system that is acceptable to everyone. This means that the haredim and modern Orthodox should negotiate unified minimum standards and apply them to everyone.

"If a restaurant or caterer wants a higher level of supervision, there are many reputable private hechsherim that can fill the void. What Bennett is trying to do is undermine the legitimate operations of the private hechshers and have the government be the sole certifier of kashrut.

"I believe the best way to move forward is for the Israeli Rabbanut to be more of a governing body for all hechshers. In order to provide kosher certification, the non-government hechshers would have to be accredited by the Rabbanut, meet certain standards, regulate their business practices and treat their mashgichim with fairness.

> Any agency allowing mashgichim to be paid by ownership loses its credibility in today's world.
> Moti Bensalmon

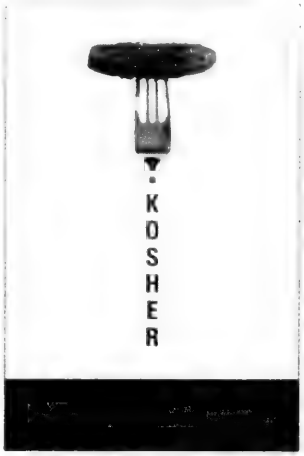
"This would also eliminate the back-room deals and put an end to agencies blocking each others' products from entry into their establishments. This is the real solution, and it will open the hashgachah market up to more real and fair competition, which would eventually bring all prices down," he said.



As to Badatz's disputes with COR, Bensalmon said, "Everywhere there is a large Jewish community like Toronto, there are multiple kashrut agencies. It's a fact of life that the COR must come to terms with. We harbour no ill will to the individuals running COR in any way. We would like to run our organization without interference from COR and vice versa.

"We have reached out to them multiple times and tried to have meaningful discussions centred on having two organizations operate by the same sets of rules in Toronto. Their position we were told is that the only solution is to join COR under their leadership and administration. As we see in other parts of the world, it's difficult to reach an agreement with people who harbour those views." ■

Ex-professor loses appeal of extradition order

DAVID LAZARUS
dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Lawyers for Hassan Diab, a former Carleton University sociology professor implicated in a notorious 1980 Paris synagogue bombing that killed four people, said they'll seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada after Ontario's Court of Appeal upheld a lower court decision to extradite him to France for the crime.

Judge Robert Maranger ruled May 15 that he had no other option under Canadian extradition law but to send Diab back to Paris for trial.

Diab, a 60-year-old native of Lebanon, has been accused of being a one-time member of the terrorist group Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) when the bombing occurred. He has maintained his innocence for the last six years, saying he did not enter France in 1980.

Diab has no criminal record in Canada and has insisted, with his lawyers, that he is a victim of mistaken identity.

In his decision, Maranger agreed that the evidence against Diab did not necessarily meet standards for conviction in a Canadian criminal court, but at an earlier hearing, he said France had enough prima facie evidence to warrant Diab's return there for trial.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs applauded the decision.

"The fact that the main suspect in this hateful terrorist attack will indeed face the justice system gives hope to the survivors and to the families of the innocent victims," CIJA said in a statement.

"The upholding of the extradition order does not assume Diab's culpability. Diab will be able to defend himself before France's judicial system, which is just as impartial as Canada's."

On Oct. 1, 1980, as Simchat Torah began, a bomb containing a large amount of the plastic explosive Semtex detonated outside the Union Libérale Israélite de France synagogue on Rue Copernic in Paris, killing four non-congregants and injuring more than 40.

At the time, then-French prime minister Raymond Barre called it a "heinous crime against Jews."

Diab, a Canadian citizen since 1993 – with dual citizenship – and an Ottawa resident since 2006, has a PhD in Sociology from the University of Syracuse in New York.

He was first arrested by the RCMP in Ottawa in connection with the bombing in November 2008 at the request of French authorities, based on German intelligence that used handwriting samples suggesting that Diab was a member of the PFLP implicated in the bombing.

Experts, though, have had conflicting opinions over the handwriting evidence.

In July 2009, Carleton University terminated Diab's teaching contract over the allegations, but professors there say his firing breached the university's contract with him.

After a series of extradition hearing delays going back to January 2010 over intelligence and evidentiary disputes, Maranger ordered Diab extradited in June 2011. In April 2012, then-justice minister Rob Nicholson ordered the same thing, but the case has continued under appeal under strict $250,000 bail conditions.

Diab has only been able to leave his home for work at the University of Ottawa, for meetings related to his case or for personal appointments. He has also been required to wear a GPS ankle bracelet pending resolution of his extradition case. ■

Liberal MP visits Middle East

jarnold@cjnews.ca

Liberal foreign affairs and international trade critic Marc Garneau says he has gained a better insight into perspectives on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict after his first official visit to the Middle East.

Speaking by phone from Cairo after spending two days in Israel and one day in the West Bank, Garneau said that speaking to Israelis and Palestinians in the wake of the collapse of the U.S.-brokered attempt to renew peace talks was instructive.

"Each feels it didn't work because there was not a willingness to compromise to an extent acceptable to both," he said. "Each felt the other side was not willing to give enough."

Marc Garneau gains insight from Mideast trip

Yet, he has the sense that "things are evolving. They are not static."

The highest-ranking Israeli official he met was Strategic and Intelligence Affairs Minister Yuval Steinitz, and in the Palestinian territories, Azzam al-Ahmed, a senior Fatah representative and chief negotiator with Hamas in trying to form a unity government between the two factions.

Garneau's scheduled meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was cancelled the day before, apparently because a meeting May 15 with U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry in London, the first since the process broke off in April, had been scheduled.

Garneau described his trip, which also included Egypt and Jordan, as "fact-finding" in nature.

He found it useful hearing Israeli officials' assessment of Iran's nuclear program and the United Nations Security Council's role in containing it, as well as of the Syrian civil strife.

Also informative was his discussion with former Israeli ambassador to Washington, Michael Oren, now associated with the Interdisciplinary Centre in Herzliya.

Garneau had visited Israel twice before: in 2003, while president of the Canadian Space Agency, and in 2009, a year after he was elected MP for the Montreal riding of Westmount–Ville Marie, on a Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs-organized trip.

Garneau said some of his Palestinian interlocutors claimed the current Canadian government is unbalanced in its approach to the conflict and biased toward Israel.

He was interviewed by the editor-in-chief of the Ramallah daily newspaper Al-Ayyam, Akram Haniyya, and had dinner with Palestinian business people.

Garneau, who was careful in his answers, said that despite, the "perception," there is "no substantive difference" between the Conservative and Liberal parties on the key issues of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Both parties support a two-state solution.

"In substance, it's essentially the same. The only difference perhaps is the way it is put forward," he said.

"We certainly do not want to make [the Israeli-Palestinian conflict] a wedge issue, but rather take reasoned positions."

Garneau, a retired naval officer and engineer, was the first Canadian astronaut to fly in outer space 30 years ago.

Liberal foreign affairs critic Marc Garneau, right, meets with Yuval Steinitz, Israel's minister for strategic and intelligence affairs.

He especially enjoyed the parts of his visit that pertained to these areas. He toured Tel Aviv's Sde Dov Airport, which is used by the Israeli Air Force for intelligence gathering operations on the borders, and meeting with Col. Salman Zarka, a physician, who headed the field hospital on the Golan Heights that has treated wounded Syrians.

Conversing with Menahem Kidron, head of the Israel Space Agency was gratifying, Garneau said.

"I went to Israel in 2003 to start a discussion on possible co-operation between the space agencies, but when I went into politics, I gave that up. I was happy to hear that current Canadian Space Agency president Gen. Walter Natynczyk [former chief of the defence staff] is keeping that up."

Garneau met with Rona Ramon, widow of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, who was killed in the fatal 2003 Columbia space launch. Garneau had been friendly with Ramon since they trained together in Houston.

Garneau gave a talk on "An Astronaut's View of Peace" at the Institute for National Security Studies, in which he described how being in outer space changed his perspective of what goes on on Earth.

The Palestinians were similarly interested in Garneau's expertise on space. He spoke on a radio science program and at two high schools on the subject.

A highlight of his day in the West Bank was touring Rawabi, a planned town in the hills where up to 20,000 people will live. "It's very modern, very green, very wired... quite spectacular," Garneau said.

The goal of the Liberal party, if it forms the next government, will be to "see if there is anything we can constructively do to bring the two groups together. But we're a middle power. We are cognizant that we do not have as much clout, for example, as the U.S." ■

Former Israeli PM sentenced to six years in prison

JTA
JERUSALEM

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert was sentenced to six years in prison for accepting bribes in the real estate scam known as the "Holyland affair."

The sentence handed down May 13 in Tel Aviv District Court would make Olmert the first Israeli premier to be sent to prison. Olmert also was fined 1 million shekels, or about $290,000, (US) in what has been called Israel's largest corruption scandal.

Olmert was convicted in March on two counts of bribery for accepting about $150,000 from developers of the Holyland project when he was the mayor of Jerusalem and later a government minister. The project involved the development of high-rises in Jerusalem.

He and six others sentenced – including his successor as mayor of Jerusalem, Uri Lupoliansky – were ordered to present themselves to the prisons service on Sept. 1.

Judge David Rozen ruled that Olmert's conviction includes "moral turpitude," which comes with a ban on seeking public office for at least seven years after his sentence has ended.

"Those who give bribes are corrupt, but those who receive it inspire disgrace and cause the public to lose faith in the state," the judge said in the courtroom. "A public servant who accepts bribes is equivalent to a traitor."

Olmert said in court that he never accepted bribes and vowed to appeal the conviction and the sentence.

"I am proud of the decade in which I ran the honest city [of Jerusalem]," he said.

Olmert resigned as prime minister in September 2008 after police investigators recommended that he be indicted in multiple corruption scandals.

The Jerusalem District Court acquitted Olmert in 2012 on charges of fraud, breach of trust, tax evasion and falsifying corporate records in what became known as the Talansky and Rishon Tours affairs.

He was found guilty on a charge of breach of trust in what is known as the Investment Center case but has appealed. The case centered on charges that he improperly involved himself in decisions benefiting his friend and former business partner Uri Messer. ■

Eye-opening sites along the Israel National Trail

Yair Lootstein

My friend Elie and his son, Emanuel, embarked on a special mission as part of the lead-up to Emanuel's bar mitzvah: hiking the 940-km-long Israel National Trail, which meanders through much of the country from Kibbutz Dan on the Lebanese border all the way south to Eilat. Almost two years into this endeavour and a year after Emanuel's bar mitzvah, they've completed nearly half the trail – no mean feat, considering they hike on weekends and school vacations, and mostly when the weather can accommodate both camping and hiking.

My son, Natan, and I have joined Elie and Emanuel on several sections of the trail. It's great for bonding. Four guys hiking and shmoozing, making their way on paths that are at times difficult. The vistas are often breathtaking, and the people you meet along the way always seem interesting. For the kids, the nightly campsites are the best – setting up tents, rolling out sleeping bags, collecting wood and cooking on open fires.

A few weeks ago, the four of us spent three days on a section of the trail running along the Carmel Ridge and Mediterranean coast from Zichron Yaacov to Givat Olga, a neighbourhood of Hadera. Along the way, we enjoyed the luscious greenery of springtime Israel, along with well-preserved archeological sites, beaches and rich agricultural lands.

Toward the end of our first day, we walked along Roman-era aqueducts into the Arab town of Jisr az-Zarka, a place I'd never visited before, although I've driven by it on countless occasions on the coastal road between Tel Aviv and Haifa. It was a real eye-opener.

The village, with roughly 14,000 inhabitants, is almost 100 per cent Muslim and is the only solely Arab community in Israel with a beach on the Mediterranean. The beach is quiet and non-commercial, with a small, old-style fishing village. But Jisr az-Zarka is also one of the poorest towns in the country, with one of the highest dropout rates for high school students. For different reasons, until the 1980s, villagers married only within themselves. Other Israeli Arabs looked disparagingly upon the village and its residents.

Walking into town, I felt we were truly entering the Middle East, with narrow streets and lanes, not particularly clean, and houses built in close quarters. Esthetically, I was reminded of my military days in Gaza.

But things are changing, and partly because the Israel National Trail runs through the village. Reaching its main junction, we entered Juha's Guesthouse. It's jointly owned by its namesake, a wonderful local entrepreneur, and a Jewish woman from a nearby moshav. Although the 12-bed inn was full when we arrived (it's been that way for months), Juha took us home, where we enjoyed a meal served by his wife, Heyfa, and where we learned much about the village and of Juha's vision for making it more attractive to visitors and thereby raising the standard of living for all its residents.

During our trip, we had many other experiences. Upon completing our days of hiking, we caught a cab to where we'd left our vehicles. Our driver was from Umm el-Fahem in the Lower Galilee. During the ride, he told us of a hate crime perpetrated in the town a day earlier. The door of a mosque had been set ablaze and graffiti calling on Arabs to leave was sprayed on its walls. He noted the growing number of anti-Arab hate crimes around the country and his frustration that not enough was being done to apprehend the perpetrators, adding his certainty that if anti-Semitic graffiti was sprayed on a synagogue, those responsible would be caught within days.

The Israel National Trail allows us to take pleasure in the natural and man-made splendour of this country, but I'm glad it's also providing Emanuel and Natan some lessons about its blemishes. I hope that they, like Juha, will want to make Israel an even better place. ■

Israeli government called on to respond to proliferation of "price-tag" attacks

JTA
TEL AVIV

Houses of worship have been vandalized, businesses defaced and car tires slashed.

So-called "price-tag" attacks have proliferated since Israeli-Palestinian peace talks were suspended at the end of April.

Intended to exact a price for Israeli government policies seen as detrimental to the settlement enterprise, such attacks have long been a problem in the West Bank. But suspected Jewish extremists increasingly are targeting Israeli Arab citizens, mosques and churches within the country's borders.

Israel's government has been left in the awkward position of confronting a string of ideologically motivated attacks perpetrated by Jews. Now calls are growing for the government to mount a stronger response.

The latest attacks come at a particularly sensitive time – just weeks before Pope Francis is due to make a high-profile visit to Israel. Anti-Christian graffiti has prompted the Vatican to express concern for the safety of Israel's Christians.

"What began as love of the land has become, in part, a wild west sown with hate toward Arabs, the state of laws and its representatives," Justice Minister Tzipi Livni wrote in a Facebook post May 7.

Attackers have slashed the tires of Arab-owned cars in the Israeli towns of Yokneam, Acre and Fureidis. Graffiti reading "Death to Arabs" was sprayed in Yokneam and eastern Jerusalem. Last week, Jerusalem's St. George Romanian Orthodox Church was defaced with the words "Price tag, King David is for the Jews, Jesus is garbage."

Even Jewish and Israeli Defence Forces institutions are not immune. Also last week, vandals reportedly defaced an Israeli army base with slogans demeaning the Pope and Arabs. The same day, swastikas inside Jewish stars were found outside Jerusalem's Conservative Moreshet Yisrael synagogue.

Israeli security forces have responded as they have since the price-tag attacks began in 2008 – with investigations and arrests.

Amos Oz, one of Israel's leading literary figures and a stalwart of the left, likened price-tag perpetrators to neo-Nazis in a nationally televised speech last week in honour of his 75th birthday.

"'Price tag' and 'hilltop youth' are sweet, sugary nicknames, and the time has come to call this monster by its name," Oz said. "We wanted to be like all other nations, we longed for there to be a Hebrew thief and a Hebrew prostitute – and there are Hebrew neo-Nazi groups."

Oz's analogy drew immediate criticism.

Reuven Rivlin, a Likud Knesset member and former Knesset speaker who was present for the speech, called it "a cheapening of the Holocaust." The Samaria Residents' Committee, a West Bank settlers' advocacy group, filed a police complaint accusing Oz of incitement to racism.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has condemned price-tag attacks, but some said the government needed to give security forces a freer hand to prevent them. Last week, Livni and Public Security Minister Yitzhak Aharonovitch recommended that Israel's Shin Bet internal intelligence agency classify the price tag attacks as terrorism.

The former head of counterterrorism operations in Netanyahu's office, Nitzan Nuriel, told JTA that continued price-tag incidents could lead to a bloody backlash from Palestinians, either against the attackers themselves or other Jewish targets.

Last week, in an apparent response to the price-tag attacks, graffiti was found in northern Israel on the tomb of Abba Halafta, a second-century rabbi, reading "Tag will pay a price."

Nuriel called for a pre-emptive approach to the price-tag attacks, similar to how Israel deals with Palestinian terror groups.

"We need to frustrate it, to cause it not to happen," said Nuriel, now a research associate at the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya's International Institute for Counter-Terrorism. "We need to act against it with more determination, to set rules."

Some Israeli media have taken to calling the attacks hate crimes, but Hebrew University political sociology lecturer, Eitan Alimi, said the definition obscures the political element in the attacks. The hateful language is a means of protest, Alimi said, not an end in itself.

"There's no doubt that the price-tag phenomenon is very influenced by political processes," Alimi said. "I'm not sure these are primarily hate crimes. They're violent acts with political logic and political goals."

While government officials decide how best to respond, a group of civilians has attempted to help the attacked communities heal. Founded in 2011 and called Light Tag, the coalition of activists from a range of left-wing and pluralist non-profits has visited places where attacks took place to meet with community leaders and offer emotional support.

On Sunday, Light Tag organized a protest opposite Netanyahu's residence in which it invoked guarantees of tolerance in Israel's Declaration of Independence. Gadi Gvaryahu, Light Tag's chairman, noted that price-tag attacks have included attempts to burn down mosques and feared they could lead to deaths if not curbed.

"A Jewish state cannot allow itself, based on Jewish beliefs, to burn down a mosque," Gvaryahu said. "People think that price tag is just graffiti. It's not just graffiti. They hurt people." ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Government needs to support tourism industry in Israel

STEVE K. WALZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Despite a steady upward trend in the numbers of foreign tourists visiting Israel during the first quarter of 2014, the Israel Hotel Association (IHA) has criticized the Israeli government for not devoting enough financial resources towards boosting incoming tourism from North America and beyond.

According to the latest Israel Ministry of Tourism statistics, 1.16 million visitors arrived in Israel between January and April 2014, which is five per cent more than during the same period in 2013, five per cent more than 2012 and nine per cent more than 2011.

Of these, 1.05 million were foreign tourists, which is 16 per cent more than 2013 and 12 per cent and 21 per cent more than 2012 and 2011 respectively.

Despite these optimistic figures, IHA president, Eli Gonen chided the Israeli government, claiming that tourism was still not a national priority and called on the Israeli government to pump millions of additional dollars into the Ministry of Tourism's annual budget.

The IHA's own statistics reflect only an eight per cent increase in the number of new hotel rooms built in Israel since 2000. Local and foreign hoteliers are not in a rush to invest in erecting new or revamping older hotel properties, as the current incoming market has not grown fast enough to spur the growth of potentially profitable enterprises.

"The government must give the hotel and tourism industry the proper support and put it at the top of the list of priorities," claimed Gonen. "As far as I am concerned this is no different than the crisis that the USA faced after the 9/11 attacks. America had an image problem, so the federal government stepped in to create a special budget for advertising, while many hotels offered special prices as well. The emergency budget had a tremendous impact on luring tourists back to New York and the USA.

The Sheraton Tel Aviv is offering special packages for summer visitors.

"Israel already suffers from an image problem based on the events that take place every day in the Middle East," said Gonen. "It's truly a shame. I have friends in the USA who have come to Israel and told me after a few days of arriving here, 'Gee, we had no idea that Tel Aviv was such a cool city and the country was so beautiful.' People have to know that we have so much to offer."

On a positive note, a substantial number of North American tourists are on the verge of booking their summer vacations in Israel. A number of quality hotels are offering a potpourri of deals including:

Mother and daughter to perform together

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Elissa Miller-Kay, a pianist who won first prize in the prestigious International Beethoven Piano Sonata Competition, is the guest soloist in an upcoming performance of the York Symphony, an orchestra that includes her mother on violin.

Miller-Kay's mother, Rickey Miller, who studied piano seriously up to the end of high school, learned to play violin as an adult. She took lessons with her then-six-year-old son, Jeremy, who's now 28.

"She learned violin alongside him," Miller-Kay said. "It's amazing to learn an instrument as an adult." She said her mother always encouraged her to take music seriously, as did the other family members, including her music-loving grandmother, Faye Miller, who at 97, still goes to the opera and symphony.

"It's a tough career," Miller-Kay said.

Miller-Kay, a Thornhill, Ont., native, won the Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award in 2006, an award created by Temple Sinai in Toronto to support the careers of young Jewish artists in Canada. She said that when she competed in the 13th Biennial International Beethoven Piano Sonata Competition in Memphis, Tenn., in 2009, she tried not to think of it as a competition in order to deal with the stress.

"I focused on communicating the music to the audience and the judges."

When it was announced that she had won, she said, "I was kind of overwhelmed and a little surprised." She added that the win was a good boost for her career.

Miller-Kay currently lives in New York, where she's doing her PhD in piano studies at New York University and teaching. She performs regularly in cities on both sides of the border and has played Carnegie Hall. She said she likes performing in Canadian cities, where there are not as many concerts as in New York "so audiences can be more enthusiastic."

She said she chose NYU so that she could study with the university's internationally acclaimed piano faculty member, Martin Canin. Also, she enjoys research and writing about music, and the university offers a program that allows her to write a dissertation. Miller-Kay is writing about the way Beethoven's piano sonatas were performed in the 19th century.

Unlike today, classical musicians improvised. They were "a lot more free," she said. She said she feels connected to many composers, but Beethoven is the one she's "drawn to the most." There's deep suffering in his music, she said, and "there's a feeling of triumph.

"That's true of many of his works. Beethoven was very bold and doing something new. He almost invented Romanticism in music. He really shocked people at the time."

Miller-Kay plays Beethoven's Piano Sonata, Op. 110, in a documentary the actor Ethan Hawke made about the piano teacher, Seymour Bernstein.

In Seymour: An Introduction, which is currently in post-production, Bernstein gives a master class to three students, and she is one of them.

Miller-Kay has an unusual background for a musician. She studied biochemistry at the University of Toronto. While she was there, she was also attending the Royal Conservatory of Music.

"It became clear that after two years I had to make a choice," she said. "It came down to my love of performing. There's nothing like performing for an audience." ■

Miller-Kay, 32, pictured, and her mother, Rickey Miller, perform with the York Symphony Orchestra on May 24 at 8 p.m. at Trinity Anglican Church in Aurora, Ont., and on May 25 at 7:30 p.m. at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts. Miller-Kay will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto, and the orchestra will perform Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. For more information about Miller-Kay, visit www.elissamillerkay.com.

GRAY, HERBERT
Yeshiva University and Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University mourn the passing of the Right Honourable Herb Gray P.C., C.C., Q.C. B. Comm., LL.B, LL.D born Herbert Eacer Gray who served as a Canadian Member of Parliament for four decades 1969-2002 and Cabinet Minister under three Prime Ministers and as Deputy Prime Minister from 1997-2002. He was Canada's first Jewish Federal Cabinet Minister and was granted the honorific "The Right Honourable" and was the third longest continuously serving Member of Parliament in Canadian history. He was the Guest Speaker at a Yeshiva University Heritage Award Dinner of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University in March 1971 and was praised in a letter from Dr. Samuel Belkin, then President of Yeshiva University "for strengthening the bonds for still greater cooperation between our two countries and particularly the Jewish communities, in working towards the ideals we cherish". May Herb Gray always be remembered with reverence for his active involvement in Jewish life and the prestige he conferred upon our people through his unique and distinguished leadership role in Canada's government from 1962-2002. May his memory be a source of enduring pride to all Canada's citizens and especially to Canadian Jewry.

Author discusses The Book of Jonah

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jonah Jacobson is a young Manhattan lawyer immersed in an important legal deal that could make him a partner, and in relationships with two beautiful women each in love with him, when the heavens open and he has a bizarre biblical vision at a party.

Suddenly he sees "the Empire State Building collapsed and Grand Central Station collapsed and the subway tunnels flooded with water and then water rising to the streets through the concrete so that what had been the city, this city, became an island again interlaced with rivers and buried in the rubble of things collapsed or burned or bombed or pulled apart like the shining marble pulled from the pyramids . . . ."

This is the beginning of Jacobson's life-changing existential crisis as described in The Book of Jonah, a novel by first-time Florida novelist Joshua Max Feldman, who recently visited Toronto on a promotional tour.

"I wanted to reimagine the biblical story (of Jonah) in a contemporary setting," Feldman told me as we sat in a coffee shop at Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street.

"I wanted to present the Jonah in my book as someone who is very worldly, very focused on his career and his somewhat fraught dating life, and someone who is not really interested in higher metaphysical questions. It's something that really doesn't register with him at all, and the initial conceit of the story is that he's suddenly confronted with what he takes to be a metaphysical divine vision."

Born and raised in Amherst, Mass., Feldman formerly worked with some success as a playwright in the "nitty gritty world of off- and off-off-Broadway theatre." The idea for the book came about after he decided to try writing 10 short stories, each one based on a different book of the Bible. "The Book of Jonah was one of the first ones that I started working on; it just grew and grew until I realized I needed to make it into a novel."

No longer enmeshed in a community of struggling theatrical artists, Feldman found the act of writing a novel a very solitary activity. But after several years of lonely work the reward came when, with the help of an ace literary agent, the manuscript was sold to two top publishers: Henry Holt in the United States and Random House in Canada. Both versions were published simultaneously and came out in February.

Joshua Max Feldman

God commands the biblical Jonah to warn the wicked residents of Nineveh that they will be punished; Jonah tries to evade this duty and is swallowed by a giant fish. Eventually he is spat up on the shore of Nineveh, delivers his prophecy and all of the Ninevites repent. Happy ending? Not really, Feldman relates.

"Jonah is actually so upset with what's happened that he tells God that he'd rather die than live. Those contradictions in the story are never really explained – and I think that's a good thing, it gives the story credit. It acknowledges that there's always going to be a degree of the unknown when we're dealing with a higher plane or a higher being."

Although it alludes centrally to a biblical tale, Feldman says his novel is not a religious book but rather "a novel about people encountering religious issues and religious questions. I try to ground the events of the book, however extraordinary, in the experiences and the relationships of the characters."

With The Book of Jonah, Feldman places himself centrally within the pantheon of modern Jewish writers, perhaps even somewhere within range of one of his favourites, Nathan Englander, although the former's prose style seems jarringly cluttered and contemporary by contrast.

Since he's written a psychological novel, it seems less than surprising that Feldman names Fyodor Dostoyevsky as "probably the writer I admire most in the world." He also admires the writing of Herman Melville, which again is not surprising since he's attempted an epic of his own. He also cites Virginia Woolf as a special influence. "She had such insight into the way the mind works," he says. "And she found such poetry in the everyday, and that's something I aspire to do in my writing." ■

The Book of Jonah is published by Bond Street Books, a division of Random House.

Challah bake unites Jewish community

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

What happens when a group of rebbetzins gather over kosher sushi on a Saturday night? A powerful community-wide project is born.

A joint project of 25 Chabad centres in southern Ontario brought together 1,500 Jewish women for the area's inaugural Mega Challah Bake May 14 at the Terrace Banquet Centre in Vaughan.

The evening's master of ceremonies Nina Miller, a community member from Toronto's Chabad on the Avenue, welcomed the guests with the words, "Before me, I see a sea of beautiful Jewish women of many generations with open hearts and smiling faces. Scan the room so as to have a sense of this magical imaging.

"Challah and Chabad have something uniquely in common," she said. "They unite Jews from all walks of life and levels of observance no matter what culture, country or Jewish factors they stem from. Tonight we are making history by forming our very own sisterhood community."

The evening also honoured the memory of two rebbetzins, 37-year-old Rashi Minkowitz from Alpharetta, Ga., in the United States, and 49-year-old Rivkie Barber from Melbourne, Australia.

The tradition of baking challah for Shabbat has been routinely passed on from mother to daughter, from one generation to the next. The task provides an opportunity for women to centre their lives in ritual and prayer, and to bless their families. It is taught that when a woman bakes challah and recites the appropriate blessings on the dough, she is bringing additional blessings into her home.

"The mitzvah of challah strengthens our faith by reminding us that all our sustenance comes to us though the hand of God. The Jewish woman not only nurtures her family physically, but also brings spiritual awareness into her home," said Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin, of Chabad of Markham.

During this period in the Jewish calendar, the days between Pesach and Shavuot, we count the Omer. It's a time when we focus on examining and refining specific aspects of our emotions.

"To have 1,500 women from different walks of life coming together, unified as one soul, and performing a special mitzvah [in baking challah] is powerful. This is a special time for us to have unity and to show our love and respect for one another," said Rebbetzin Rivky Gansburg of Chabad of York Mills.

Hundreds of volunteers helped prepare for the event. All participants received an apron; a bowl; containers of pre-measured sugar, oil, salt, yeast and flour; and an egg.

"We had shifts of 40 women every hour on the hour pack the ingredients needed to make the challah," Plotkin said.

The vibe of the evening was both spiritual and enthusiastic. Plotkin led the audience through a kabbalistic explanation, dedication and meditation for each ingredient used in preparing the challah and the effect that it has on the different parts of our lives.

"While sifting the flour, sing because joy is the foundation of all spiritual success," she said.

"Add each ingredient consciously: sugar, for the sweetness you hope to see in your family's life; yeast, so that each member of your family will grow and expand; water, representing Torah, which flows from a higher place to this world; flour, for the material blessings HaShem sends our way; eggs, for the blessings of life and children; and salt, representing rebuke – fill three tablespoons, then shake some back into the container because we should always give away less rebuke than we think we should; oil – anoint each member of your family by name, praying for his or her specific needs Oil also symbolizes the secrets of the Torah, which permeates everything."

On each table was a tzedakah box. "Jewish tradition has… been that we give charity before… we do a mitzvah," Plotkin said, referring to the mitzvah of separating the challah, reciting a blessing, taking a portion of the dough and burning it before shaping and baking the challah.

A girls choir entertained the women, who linked arms, singing and dancing in circles around their tables.

The final step in the challah baking was a braiding demonstration by an expert. She demonstrated the four-braided challah, whose strands represent arms intertwined – symbolizing love, truth, peace, creation, freedom, harmony, family connection, unity and justice.

Each woman went home with two loaves of challah to bake and a positive connection to the mitzvah of challah in Judaism. ■

Young cellist receives Temple Sinai award

RUTH SCHWETIZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Beth Silver, 22, the winner of this year's Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, has been playing cello since she was four years old.

"Most string players start very young," Silver said on the telephone from Montreal, where she is taking a master's degree in cello performance at McGill University and playing in the McGill Symphony Orchestra.

Silver won the Steinberg award for her musical talent, instrumental technique and overall musicianship. The award, named after Ben Steinberg when he retired as music director at Toronto's Temple Sinai in 1996, was created by the temple in 1983 to support the careers of young Jewish artists in Canada.

Silver said that while she was growing up, people told her how well she played cello. "But it wasn't till university that I discovered how much I loved it," she added.

When she was two years old, Silver told her mother, Carla, who teaches band instruments and choral music at Roselawn Public School in York Region, that she wanted to play cello.

But Carla Silver would have preferred that her daughter play flute, clarinet or horn. "Cello isn't her area of expertise. She wanted me to play something she could help me with," Silver explained. However, Silver insisted on cello, and at the age of four, her wish came true and she was enrolled in lessons.

Silver learned how to play cello outside of public school, as York Region schools – she's a Richmond Hill, Ont., native – don't offer a string program. "I had many teachers who inspired me," she said.

Attending Unionville High School, an arts high school, gave her the chance to play cello at school. This year, Silver is enthralled with the classical composers Benjamin Britten, Brahms and Bartok, but she said last year she was big on French romantic music.

The tastes of music students change constantly, she added, and sometimes "we're discovering new things in the music we've heard before. Our ears get more sophisticated."

She spends a couple of hours practising each day, but she said that it's important for her to get out and play with other musicians. On the day The Canadian Jewish News spoke to her, Silver was on her way to rehearse with a trio.

After she finishes university, she said she plans to audition for orchestras. But she added that classical musicians should be flexible, "keep an open mind" and expand their musical horizons. A fan of klezmer, gypsy bands and bluegrass music, Silver has been playing in the indie folk scene in Montreal, improvising with other musicians.

"Everyone brings something different, depending on their instrument, their personality," she said.

Silver has received awards from the Royal Conservatory of Music, the York Region Arts Council and the Kiwanis Festival. She's a recipient of the Martin Gelber and Yo Yo Ma scholarships, and she has played with the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra and the University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

This year, she performed in the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's Young People's Concert Series. ■

Beth Silver

Silver performs a free concert at Temple Sinai on May 28. She will play the Poulenc Cello Sonata and Brahms Violin Sonata No. 2 in A Major, Op. 100, which she arranged for cello. She'll also perform a piece by Ben Steinberg, music by George Perle, and songs by Gabriel Faure. She will be accompanied by pianist Jenna Richards.

Crown Height riot focus of book for young adults

MYRON LOVE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Eva Wiseman's stories have ranged throughout Jewish history. Reflecting her Hungarian Jewish background, Wiseman's first four novels explored various aspects of the Hungarian Jewish experience during and after World War II.

For her fifth novel, Pupper, she reached back into the 19th century and the blood libel in a Hungarian Jewish community. For her sixth novel, The Last Song, she went even farther back in time to the Jewish experience at the time of the expulsion from Spain over 500 years ago

Now, with her latest work, The World Outside, (Random House) Wiseman has returned to recent times. The World Outside is set in August, 1991 at the time of the Crown Heights riots in New York City.

Wiseman describes the Crown Heights riots as a modern day pogrom. The riots began on Aug.19, 1991, after a black child was accidentally struck and killed by an automobile in the motorcade of the late Lubavitcher Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Several Jews were seriously injured during the riot and Yankel Rosenbaum, a follower of Rabbi Schneerson, was murdered.

Wiseman's novels are intended for teenage and young adult readers. The World Outside focuses on Chanie Altman, a 17-year-old girl from a Lubavitch family in New York who aspires to be an opera singer in a society where women singing for an audience that includes men is strictly forbidden. "She meets a Jewish boy from outside her world who opens her eyes to the possibilities of the wider world outside," Wiseman says.

"I had read about the Crown Heights riots but didn't know a lot about them when I decided to write this novel," she says, "and I knew less about Lubavitch."

To learn about the Lubavitch lifestyle, she arranged to spend six days living with a Lubavitch family in New York. "I tried not to have any preconceived notions," she says. "While I was there, I followed their customs and wore long skirts and kept my head covered."

She describes her time with the family as a most interesting experience living amidst people who follow a thousand-year-old lifestyle but use modern technology in the form of computers and smart phones in their mission to reach out to other Jews.

"The people were very welcoming," she says. "I davened with them at 770 Eastern Parkway (the home of Schneerson). I even had four invitations for Shabbat."

As part of her research, she interviewed eight teenage Lubavitch girls. "They all seem to be well-adjusted," she says. "All aspired to be shlichim (the Lubavitch representatives in communities worldwide). It is very much an insulated community."■

Rabbi Silver, Israel and the Diaspora

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Sixty-six years after the creation of the State of Israel, Jews in the Diaspora still struggle to define its significance for our lives. Does the success of Zionism logically mean the ultimate demise of all communities of Jews outside of Israel?

On the other hand, can Diaspora Judaism simply continue as if the State of Israel did not exist?

The Downfall of Abba Hillel Silver and the Foundation of Israel, a new book by Ofer Shiff of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, traces the early history of these debates through the depiction of Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver (1893-1963), one of the first and most prominent Reform rabbis to work toward the establishment of the State of Israel.

At the inception of the Reform movement, its leaders felt that Jewish nationalism was incompatible with their religious principles. The famous Reform manifesto, the Pittsburgh Platform, declared in 1885: "We consider ourselves no longer a nation, but a religious community, and therefore expect neither a return to Palestine . . . nor the restoration of any of the laws concerning the Jewish state."

Like many Jews today, Reform and otherwise, early Reform Jews believed that the modern democracies of the West were hospitable homes for Jews and that the processes of enlightenment and emancipation had made it possible for Jews to live fulfilling Jewish lives in the Diaspora. They advocated various adjustments to Judaism to make it fit better into the West.

Early 20th-century Zionist leaders, on the other hand, argued that the so-called "Jewish problem" could not be solved in the Diaspora. The Jewish people, they felt, ought to abandon the Diaspora, where they had been mistreated for much of the last 1,800 years, and establish an autonomous Jewish state where they could finally regain control of their own fate and not depend on the grace of others.

Rabbi Silver, a leading Jewish American thinker and activist, changed the equation that a Reform Jew was a non-Zionist Jew. He believed that in the 20th century the Jewish people was going through two distinct but compatible processes of adjusting to modernity: religious accommodation to allow integration in the West, and Zionism.

Proving to ourselves and to the world that we were capable of running a democratic state was an important step in the process of becoming modern Jews. To this end, he worked tirelessly for the movement, developing close personal relationships with Israeli Zionist leaders.

> Rabbi Silver... changed the equation that a Reform Jew was a non-Zionist Jew

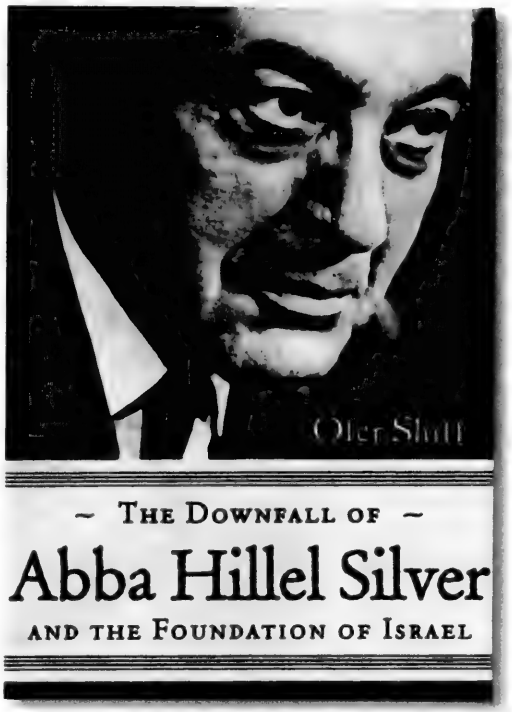
Shiff paints an interesting portrait of Rabbi Silver. Not surprisingly, despite his Zionism he still had much in common with classical Reform Judaism. In the 1930s, his sermons encouraged German Jews not to emigrate but to stay in Germany, fighting for democracy and for their own rights, and thereby proving that in modern times, Jews could thrive and live freely in the West. He felt that if Jews left, it would be an admission that emancipation had failed. By the end of the 1930s, he abandoned this position. Yet after 1948, he regained some of his optimism, arguing that an important result of the creation of the State of Israel was that world Jews could once again trust the nations of the world, a trust that had been undermined by the Shoah.

Shiff's book centres on the surprising story of the last 15 years of Rabbi Silver's life, right after the State was founded. After years of being a central participant in the Zionist movement, he was pushed out of the corridors of power. Shiff argues that the leaders of the State, particularly David Ben-Gurion, had been willing and eager to receive Rabbi Silver's help before 1948 but that once the State was established, they had no more use for someone who believed there was a congenial home for Jews outside of Israel. They believed in a Zionism that negated the Diaspora, and had worked together with Rabbi Silver before 1948 only to take advantage of his influence and connections.

A careful reading of the book shows that other factors as well may have led to Rabbi Silver's political "downfall." As a supporter of the Republican Party in the United States, the Israelis should have been able to use Rabbi Silver's political connections between 1952 and 1960, when the Republican Dwight Eisenhower was president. But Ben-Gurion's left-of-centre world view was not a good fit with Rabbi Silver's. On a trip to Israel in the early years of the State, Rabbi Silver received a cool reception from Israelis, with the notable exception of members of the General Zionist party, which was more to the right than Ben-Gurion. Many Israelis also found Rabbi Silver's American Reform style off-putting even though he spoke a rich and fluent modern Hebrew. A Ha'aretz editorial insultingly labelled him a preacher, and criticized him for unrealistically promoting world peace.



Shiff has done careful archival research on the papers of Rabbi Silver. His story involves detailed political machinations both in Israel and in the United States, which are difficult to understand without a good knowledge of the history of the middle decades of the 20th century. Knowledgeable readers, though, are likely to be interested in Rabbi Silver's story as Jews throughout the world still ponder today the relationship of Israel and Diaspora Jewry. ■

Ask Ella: Is it acceptable to pass on gift giving?

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

Three months ago, my son Joshua became a bar mitzvah. We had a kiddush luncheon after the service and a big party later that weekend. Josh did amazing reading the Torah and his speech was meaningful. His dad and I couldn't be prouder. The uncomfortable part, though, is that a few people who joined in our celebration all weekend long have not given Joshua a gift. We've tried to let it go, but can't. We've always given generously at their simchahs. How do we deal with this when we see these people?

Can't Get Past It

Dear Can't Get Past It

Mazel tov on Joshua becoming a bar mitzvah. Sounds like you've done everything to make Josh's day special.

There are many customs we follow when making a simchah, and one of those is gift giving. People are always asking, "How much?" What if it's just a luncheon? What if it's someone not so close? What if I have 10 of these things to attend this year?

Giving gifts at bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings is customary, but some people just do not adhere to this custom. It's a fact of life that I've seen over and over.

Let me ask you this: if you knew in advance that your invited guest will not be giving a gift, would you still have invited them? Was the gift the reason you wanted them to be part of Josh's special day? Probably not.

In our society, it's customary to give gifts. They're often monetary, but they're always an acknowledgment of the occasion you are celebrating.

In the end, you can't control what others do. You can only control how you react to it. Do and say what you have to behind closed doors, but be thankful that you were able to give Joshua the kind of bar mitzvah experience you dreamed he would have and take comfort and pride in knowing that you've done the best by your son.

Others have to live with their choices. Try not to judge them. It may be as simple as they forgot, or they may have purposely decided they can't or won't give.

When you send out thank-you cards to those guests, thank them for joining Josh on his special day, and don't mention anything about a gift.

Do I think it's right? I do not. I think Joshua's bar mitzvah should be acknowledged with a gift, no matter how small. Sometimes something homemade and personal is more special and meaningful.

The gift is symbolic and expresses to Joshua and to you that he is special and appreciated. It's the proper thing to do.

Dear Ella,

I've been living with my partner for the last two years. We get along well for the most part, but no matter what we argue about, he needs to be right. If he feels he is losing ground in an argument, he leaves. When he returns, he's fine, but I'm seething by then. Do you have any idea how I can fix this problem?

Needs to be Right

Dear Needs to be Right

You are arguing with someone who needs to have control. This is less about you than it is about him. He's not doing this purposely. It's part of his personality. If he feels he's not getting anywhere, he becomes frustrated. The next step that he can control is to remove himself from the situation. By leaving, he becomes the winner.

I would venture to say that the subject matter of your argument is not all that insurmountable, however establishing control in his mind is. It's part of his personality, and he probably doesn't even realize it. If you try to explain it to him, once again, he'll be losing his control, and you can't win. He may try to be controlling in other situations in his life as well.

If this trait is interfering with your ability to communicate, you need to look into professional counselling. Getting him to accept this would be a big step, as he would first have to admit there's a problem.

Communication is key to any good relationship. Hopefully the love you share will trump his need to control a situation, and you will both come out stronger in the end. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

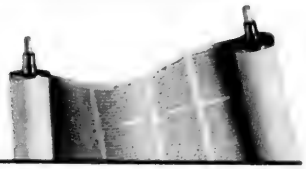
Parshah

Bamidbar | Numbers 1:1 - 4:20



Rabbi Ilan Acoca says charity and unity bring about redemption and a new Temple
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains why even the best plans sometimes go sideways
Rabbi Catharine Clark argues focusing on the task at hand helps us deal with tragedy

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The book of Bamidbar mainly deals with the laws and history of the Tabernacle.

Parshat Bamidbar starts by speaking about the position of the Tabernacle and the formation of the 12 tribes around it.

The verse (2:2) says, "The Children of Israel shall encamp, each man by his banner according to the insignias of their fathers household, at a distance surrounding the Tent of the Meeting shall they encamp."

The Ben Ish Chai explains that unity and charity are two character traits that will bring the redemption and the building of the Temple, and both are alluded to in the above verse.

In Hebrew, the cumulative total of letters in the names of our forefathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is 13, the same as the numerical value as the word echad (aleph is one, chet – eight, dalet – four), meaning one. The tribes represent our forefathers, and they must be one .

Tzedakah is symbolized by the word mineged (surrounding). We could divide it into two and have two words, min and gad. The word min means "from," and gad comprise the letters gimmel and dalet, which the Talmud says (Shabbat 104a) stand for "gemol dalim," alleviate the plight of the poor.

The Ben Ish Chai says that if we give tzedakah and also work on our unity, we will merit to be "surrounding the Tent of the Meeting," alluding to Am Yisrael residing around the Temple, which will once again serve as HaShem's heavenly abode on earth.

This message comes during the period of the Omer, when 24,000 disciples of Rabbi Akiva died because they did not treat each other respectfully. History has taught us repeatedly that when Jews aren't united, calamity happens.

Let us all improve these two middot and together see the glory of HaShem residing among us as in days of old. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

The Torah portion of Bamidbar begins after 10 static ones. Leviticus has theology and ritual, but no plot, no character development and no movement. In contrast, the Book of Numbers finds the People of Israel on the move in the wilderness, taking us from the second year after the Exodus to the edge of the Land of Promise, 38 years later.

Bamidbar begins with a census of men fit to bear arms. Our portion focuses on the Levites, exempt from military service, who are divided into three families and dedicated for Sanctuary service.

The people are structured by tribe and ancestral house, stationed surrounding the Sanctuary and organized to march forward, arranged for battle and conquest. Everything is prepared as the people ready themselves to leave the mountain of God, escorting the portable representation of the divine Presence, the Ark of the Covenant.

Then, unexpectedly, everything goes sideways. The people murmur and complain. The scouting expedition ends in panic. There are conflicts over food and leadership. The water becomes bitter. There are losses in battle and plague. The plan for conquest becomes confused and chaotic. Despite the balagan, by the end of the 10 portions of Bamidbar, the people stand at the cusp of the Land. The generation of the Exodus has died off. A new cohort is prepared to move forward.

Many of us imagine our lives progressing in an orderly way, according to a framework we lay out for ourselves. But often, plans go sideways. There may be war, revolution, illness, family fracas, career change, or economic and geographic upheaval. Hopefully, we can stay alive, hold on, keep faith, maintain some direction and approach the uncertain land with some sense of promise and possibility.

A friend often repeats these words: The end of the story will be good. If it isn't good, it's not the end. Perhaps bitter water can become sweet. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

The main topics of Parshat Bamidbar are the census of the Israelites in the desert and the duties of the Levites in maintaining the Mishkan. The latter is introduced with the information that "Nadav and Avihu died by the will of the Lord when they offered alien fire before the Lord in the wilderness of Sinai, and they left no sons."

This reference to the deaths of Nadav and Avihu seems almost an aside. The tragic fate of Aaron's two sons after offering alien fire to the Lord was related many parshiyot ago, in Parshat Shmini. The Torah has covered numerous topics since then, such as rituals for purifying a leper and the laws of the shmittah year of rest for the land. Their deaths aren't essential background for the instructions that follow. Yet here again, their deaths are brought to our attention.

This parshah isn't the only time that the Torah refers to the deaths of these two priests after they occur. Mention is made elsewhere in Leviticus and Numbers also. While in none of these instances is the reference essential to the narrative, neither is the mention ever a mere aside. Rather, the Torah is telling us something important about the process of grief.

The loss of a loved one, especially of a child or in the case of an unexpected death, always remains at the edge of consciousness. The slightest suggestion of a somewhat related topic brings the loss to the forefront. Mourners don't "move on" or "forget about it." Rather, they develop ways to cope. Acknowledging the tragedy, even if only internally, then focusing on the task at hand is one of these strategies. That's exactly what happens in this week's parshah when the mention of Nadav's and Avihu's deaths is followed by important instructions for the functioning of the Mishkan. ■

Hillel presents three Mikeys to two universities

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Mikey Network prides itself on providing easy-to-use defibrillators to public institutions, and last week the organization announced that in co-operation with Hillel, three more life-saving devices have been placed on two Canadian university campuses.

Hillel student representatives made the presentations to the University of Winnipeg, located in the city's downtown, and Dalhousie University in Halifax.

The donations are part of Hillel's goal of giving back to the campus community, said Josh Winestock, Winnipeg Hillel and Jewish Campus Life director. "We like to help out, so we want the defibrillators to be put to good use."

"When I first heard of their plans to donate the automated external defibrillators [AEDs], I was very excited," said Ethelinda Padua, the University of Winnipeg's safety and health specialist. "The accessibility and availability of these life saving devices benefits not only the University of Winnipeg campus, but also the surrounding community."

Hillel student Daniel Kroft demonstrates the use of a defibrillator using a trainer.

The university has acquired other AEDs and plans to have one in every building on campus within a few years, she added.

Presentation of the Mikeys was accompanied by a demonstration of its use by Hillel student leader Daniel Kroft. The Mikeys were placed in the campus' Richardson College for the Environment and Science Complex and the Buhler Centre.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) helped bring Hillel and the Mikey Network together, said Judy Zelikovitz, CIJA's vice-president for universities and local partner services.

The local Hillels raised most of the $1,500 cost for each defibrillator, and CIJA "topped up" any shortfall, she said.

Hillel's involvement further integrated them into the campus community.

"When you lead by example and contribute to the benefit of all students, it can only help you feel part of the university community," Zelikovitz said.

The "Mikeys" are named for Mike Salem, an avid golfer who died of a heart attack while playing his favourite game 12 years ago. He might have been saved had a defibrillator been present.

Morty Henkle, executive director of the Mikey Network, said "we're certainly delighted both universities took up the offer of a donation by Hillel."

The Winnipeg and Halifax universities now join other Canadian campuses in receiving Mikeys. The University of Toronto, Ryerson University and Wilfred Laurier University are among several that have received the devices, he said.

To date, some 1,550 Mikeys have been placed in public buildings across Canada accounting for "19 saves" – people alive today thanks to prompt use of the apparatus, Henkle said. ■

David Abitbol: Jewrotica promotes Jewish sexuality

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Former Montrealer David Abitbol, founder of the popular blog Jewlicious.com, spoke to The CJN recently about his involvement with a different kind of Jewish site – one that's described as "a pluralistic and sex-positive organization that explores the intersection of Judaism and sexuality, relationships, gender and body image through essays, literature, erotica, Torah commentary and in-person programming."

Abitbol, 49, who was born in Israel and raised in Montreal, only to move back to Israel nine years ago, explains his role with Jewrotica.org as its web designer and contributor, and what excites him about the 1-1/2-year-old site that attracts up to 50,000 visitors a month.

You're a Jewrotica co-founder?

Ayo [Oppenheimer] came up with the idea... We met in the context of – did you ever hear of ROI Community [a global network of Jewish innovators]?... She came up with this idea and I said, "Wow that is awesome. I will help you make a logo right now, and we've got to build a website."

That was June or July of 2012, and within a couple months, we had a website up and we were churning out articles and the attention was almost immediate. We were getting press coverage from Russian and Spanish, German newspapers and others... and it was great.

We recruited a crew of volunteers, everything from graphic artists to editors to editorial staff and they all work really hard to put together this project. We also have a speaker series, so we have sessions and whatnot in different cities... It's a cool hook, because everyone comes in for the sex and you slip in a little bit of Jewish education, and then you learn something.

David Abitbol with Jewrotica co-founder Ayo Oppenheimer

What was it that got you so excited about the idea of a Jewish-themed erotica website?

I live [in Jerusalem] right next to a haredi neighbourhood and I can't help but see all these signs all over the place about modesty and conducting yourself properly, but it's always aimed at women... I grew up Orthodox. I'm still Orthodox, I'm traditional and everything... [but] it struck me as foreign, this obsession with female sexuality and suppressing it, and then I realize that these sorts of things are the result of centuries of living in the Diaspora among Christians and Christian values and morals regarding sexuality that must have seeped into Judaism, because Judaism's perspective on sexuality is not the same as the Christian perspective. In Judaism, the first mitzvah in the Torah is pru urvu, be fruitful and multiply. So, the reason why I was excited about Jewrotica was not because I wanted to read stories about two people getting it on by the light of the menorah. There is some of that there on the website, but the part that excited me the most was the discussion on sexuality in Judaism and how Judaism strives to elevate sexuality.

What is Jewish sexual expression and how is it different from secular sexual expression?

Jewish sexual expression, I guess, it's that it's just a more thoughtful expression of sexuality. Not that you can't be thoughtful about your sexuality if you're secular, but Judaism mandates a thoughtful and considered and respectful approach to sexuality.

As a contributor, what do you like to read about and write about?

The things I tend to write about are certainly not anything that would be described as erotica [laughing]. The things that interest me the most are things that relate directly to Torah's attitude toward sexuality and those sorts of discussions. The erotica stuff, the more XXX-rated stuff, I'm happy that it's there, because at least it spurs discussion, but I don't think I'd ever write something like that.

When it comes to some of the X-rated content, there is really nothing inherently Jewish about it, other than the fact that the character's names are Moshe and Rachel...

I have to tell you, it makes me uncomfortable.

You're uncomfortable reading it, or having it on the site?

Both. I'm not 100 per cent comfortable with it at all. I'm glad that it's there, because it's part of the conversation. I mean, I'm not the Taliban. I'm not going to sit there and decide for anyone else what Jewish sexuality or what Jewish erotica should be. There is some poetry on the site, which is stupendous, but the standard Jewish Penthouse letters, that kind of thing, I'm not as excited about. But there is definitely stuff in there that is great.

What are you most proud of?

That we put it out there and people are talking about it and contemplating the role of sexuality and Judaism. My whole purpose in doing this was to distinguish us from Christian-influenced values that have seeped into Judaism, and to whatever extent we've done that, that's what I'm most proud of. ■

Sholom Aleichem's On Account of a Hat

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN

Sholom Aleichem's famous story recounts the adventure of a certain Sholem Shachnah of Kasrilevke, known as the Rattlebrain, who is rushing home from Minsk in time for Pesach. He must switch trains in the middle of the night at Zlodievka, and that's when the trouble starts. In the small, crowded waiting room, he squeezes onto a bench beside an official in an elegant uniform, snoring away. Before falling asleep himself, though, he pays a porter to be sure to awaken him when the train for Kasrilevke arrives.

The porter awakens poor Sholem the Rattlebrain from such a deep sleep that Sholem takes the official's hat by mistake, red band, visor and all. At the crowded ticket window, people move aside for "His Excellency" and Sholem is stunned by the newfound respect. He thinks they are mocking him, but is glad to get his ticket in time to board the train for his return to Kasrilevke before Pesach.

Once on the train and settled in, Sholem the Rattlebrain passes a mirror and sees his reflection. The first thing that catches his eye is the official's cap, and it's the only thing that he sees. He concludes that it's the official who's on the train and he must be asleep back in the train station!

So what does he do? He jumps off the train to go back to the station to wake himself up. Of course, the train leaves, and the suitably named Rattlebrain must spend Pesach with strangers in a strange city. When he finally does make it home after Pesach, he is properly berated by his irate wife and mocked by the Kasrilevke townspeople who follow him everywhere calling him, "Your Excellency." And so the story ends.

What is the meaning of this bizarre, funny story? The whole narrative centres on Sholem seeing only the official's cap in the mirror and not himself. If that's the official's cap in the mirror, he must be thinking, then that couldn't possibly be Sholem, a simple Jew, who could never reach such a position in prewar eastern Europe. Even a Rattlebrain knew his place, and that place was decidedly on the lowest rung of the social and economic ladder.

> As is so often the case in literature, it takes a fool to make us see ourselves

As is so often the case in literature, it takes a fool to make us see ourselves. The rest of us are too busy evading or denying the truth. Fiction doesn't deal with facts, but it is in the business of revealing the truth. In this case, Sholom Aleichem invents a character and a situation to portray a society in which the Jew was so lacking in status in the surrounding, hostile society that it was positively unimaginable that he and that cap could ever inhabit the same space. It's a dramatic image of powerlessness. It speaks to the Jew's utter lack of dignity and self-respect. The humour is a mask to deaden the pain, but the truth remains with the reader of the time as a stark reminder of his situation.

That the event takes place at Pesach serves to emphasize the theme. The Passover festival commemorates the Jews' liberation from slavery, their moral empowerment and spiritual redemption. This story is highly ironic, as the Jews, represented by the hapless Sholem Shachnah, millennia after the original Passover of freedom, are emotionally and psychologically demoralized and living in a society that dehumanizes them.

The story's title, On Account of a Hat, privileges the object, the hat, not the person. In such circumstances, it's not the person – certainly not the Jew – who has any value, but rather the symbol of power and prestige, the hat. Employing humour to draw in the reader and entertain him or her, Sholom Aleichem draws a poignant and revealing portrait of the life of the Jew in eastern Europe before the Holocaust.

Our situation is very different today. Isn't it? ■

Paul Socken is distinguished professor emeritus at the University of Waterloo.

This is what happens when people care.

As President and CEO of University Health Network, Dr. Bob Bell thought the best way to provide better healthcare for the citizens of Ontario was to secure UHN's position as Canada's largest research hospital. For the past nine years, he has guided this diverse centre of excellence to its goal. The synergy that exists today between staff, doctors and nurses, researchers and surgeons is unparalleled and will continue to grow.

When people like Dr. Bell care about our health, an attained goal simply gives rise to a new one – he has accepted an appointment with the Ontario Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care as Deputy Minister. As citizens of Ontario, we can count ourselves fortunate once again.

We asked Dr. Bell what would be the best way his friends and UHN supporters could thank him. His response was immediate and straightforward: "Support for our UHN research enterprise would be the best gift that anyone could provide to honour and remember my time as CEO at UHN."

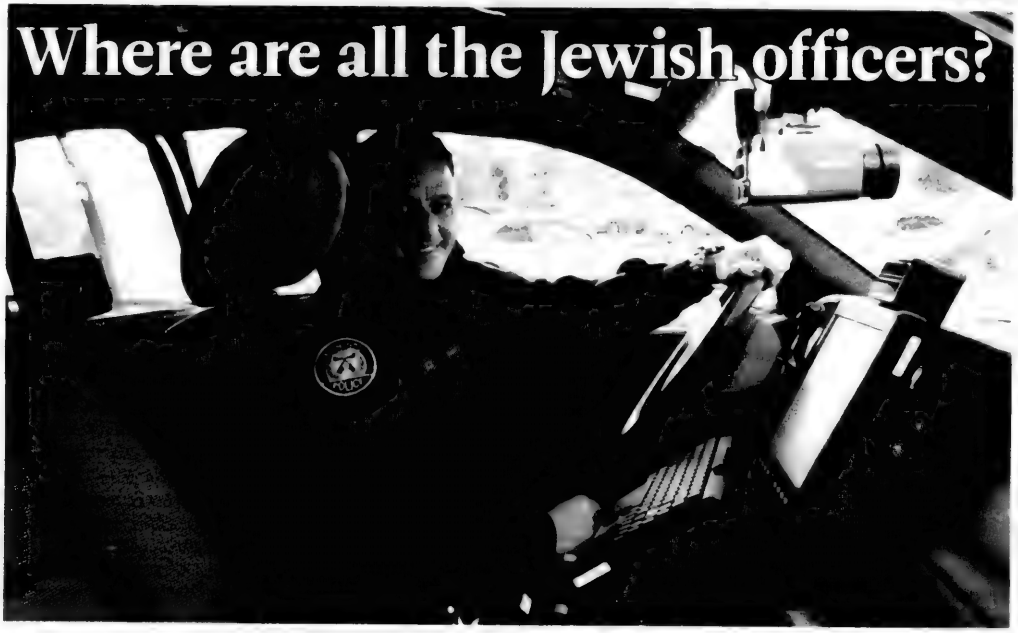
Where are all the Jewish officers?



Sgt. Lawrence Sager is a 25-year veteran of the Toronto Police Service. He estimates that out of 7,000 officers on the force, there might be 40 to 50 Jews.

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Jewish religion and culture place great value on helping others, on social justice and on the concept of tikkun olam, or repairing the world. In fact, Jewish law not only encourages an observer to engage in kindness and good deeds, but requires it.

Perhaps it's no coincidence that the professions stereotypically linked to Jews – medicine and law – are based on the philosophy of helping others and promoting justice and morality.

Yet, when it comes to law enforcement careers – ones that include justice, keeping the peace and protecting citizens – Jews are highly under-represented in these roles.

Sgt. Lawrence Sager, who recently celebrated 25 years with the Toronto Police Service (TPS), recalled his experience when he decided on a career chosen by so few members of his community.

Sager, who started his career working as a first responder and in public security as part of Montreal Police Service's civilian staff before being recruited by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) in 1987, said that when he reported to the RCMP Training Academy's depot division, he felt like the odd man out.

"When I went through Regina, those guys hadn't seen a Jewish policeman or a Jewish recruit ever. I don't know if I was the first – I probably wasn't – but there had been so few that they couldn't even remember the last time," Sager said.

"When I left for the RCMP, the Canadian Jewish News did an article... because it was so unusual for a Jewish person to be a policeman. At that time, only one other Jewish person that I knew of was in the Montreal Police Service."

He said the fact that he was a member of such a small minority made him nervous.

"I didn't want to be a pioneer, and let's face it, it was very much a Christian organization then. We didn't have too many minorities. It wasn't officially Christian, but when more than 90 per cent are white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant or Catholic, as a Jewish person, you're going in there and you're kind of breaking down barriers that some people may not necessarily want broken."

Guitarist's estate to sue Zeppelin, and defining a dip

Was it a partly Jewish stairway?

Lawyers for deceased guitarist-songwriter Randy California are getting ready to sue British rock legends Led Zeppelin for allegedly stealing part of their biggest hit Stairway to Heaven from him. California, who died in 1997, wrote the song Taurus for the 1968 debut album of the band Spirit, which opened for Led Zeppelin on a North American tour that year and next. Six years ago, Stairway was estimated to have earned $560 million in royalties and record sales. The album it appears on, Led Zeppelin IV, is America's third-biggest-seller ever, with 23 million copies sold.

If Sabra Dipping Co. has its way, naming dips made from black beans, lentils or soybeans as hummus will be verboten in America. The hummus maker, co-owned by PepsiCo and Israel's Strauss Group, has asked the Food and Drug Administration to create a standard for dips to be called hummus. It would mandate that hummus consist primarily of chickpeas and at least five per cent tahini. The 11-page proposal asks that the dip be defined as "the semi-solid food prepared from mixing cooked, dehydrated, or dried chickpeas and tahini with one or more optional ingredients." Similar standards exist for other condiments, such as ketchup, mustard and mayonnaise. Sales of hummus have soared in the United States over the last decade, and Sabra controls 60 per cent of the market.

Letters to the Editor

Kosher retailers also at fault

After reading your article ("The politics of kashrut," The CJN, May 8), I wanted to express my frustration with prices of kosher food, in particular, meat.

On Passover, I purchased a 12- to 12.5-pound brisket from a kosher butcher and paid a shocking $268. I asked the retailer why it was so expensive. Of course their response was because it is kosher and all the related expenses to make it kosher. I understand and accept that, however, I find it hard to believe that COR (the Kashruth Council of Canada) would charge that much to justify such an outrageous price per pound. My educated guess is that the profit margins, in particular for meat, are substantially higher, as was the case with my brisket.

Although I'm fortunate enough to be able to indulge in such a luxury, I feel it's unfair to others who may not be able to enjoy what is a Jewish tradition. One wonders how many families have opted to buy "kosher style" because they blame COR or the retailer.

My opinion is that COR may have some impact on kosher meat, but I believe retailers are marking it up substantially.

Add women to COR board

I have found the current series of reports on COR (the Kashruth Council of Canada) to be very interesting, relevant and especially timely.

I have a further question: If the Jewish woman is the akeret habayit, or mainstay of the home, and is entrusted with the responsibility of ensuring the kashrut of her home, how is it that there is no woman on the board of COR?

I would think that with all the experience in shopping, cooking and keeping kashrut in general, a woman would be an ideal candidate to monitor and help run COR.

Fanning the flames

The article about COR ("The politics of kashrut, The CJN, May 8) is a chillul HaShem. You have accomplished nothing by printing a story about the animosity between the COR and the Badatz hashgachot. What was the point? The article only serves to fuel the flames of anti-Semitism, particularly on the part of PQ MNA wannabes who claimed that the cost of kosher certification serves only to line the pockets of rabbis.

Stop eating animals

In response to the many pages of print dedicated to a discussion about kosher food, I appeal to all readers to consider their choices. Yes, if indeed kosher food is more expensive, this would be appalling. I have yet to see kosher plant-based foods at exorbitant prices.

As someone who is Jewish, I have stood before kosher slaughterhouses in Montreal and Toronto. There are literally tears coming down the eyes of the cows. Some of the chickens are dead, and certainly all appear diseased and sick. In general, the animals can be seen to be suffering greatly and covered in their own filth.

In Israel, plant-based restaurants and diets are on the rise. Why can't we, in the Jewish community in Canada, follow suit? There is passage after passage in the Torah about minimizing the suffering of animals and showing humans' relationship to the rest of the earth. Surely this is what is spoken of in all Jewish sacred texts: not only the minimizing but the absolute abolition of harm done to others.

We now are finding that a plant-based diet is the healthiest for humans, reducing heart disease, diabetes and many cancers. For the environment, our health and for all the sentient beings around us, we owe them all and ourselves such compassion.

Thanks from Calgary

Mazel tov to The CJN on your new look. I especially enjoy the Rabbi-2-Rabbi weekly piece. Coming from a small Jewish community like Calgary, clergy is limited, and we are not often provided with such riveting dialogue. It is great to read about the wonderful events and activities that are taking place in other communities, and your paper is a vehicle to keep us in the West connected with Canadian Jewry.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Testing the limits of tolerance

Should we be as open as possible or balk at extending full respect to denominations that don't validate our own approach to Judaism?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: What are the limits you have regarding pluralism and other denominations? I am always torn between wanting to be as open as possible and hesitating to extend full respect to denominations that don't recognize my approach to Judaism as valid.

Personally, I used to be much less tolerant, but I was quite influenced by Brad Hirschfield's book You Don't Have to Be Wrong For Me To Be Right, the title of which has become something of a mantra for me. Nevertheless, I feel uncomfortable praying in a setting that's not religiously aligned with my own ideas. How do you navigate the varieties of religious experience?

Rabbi Scheim: I am fascinated by the varieties of behaviour exhibited by Jews far to the right of my Conservative congregation who attend a Shabbat morning service as guests of a simchah family. I give them credit for attending, because I recognize that being in a mixed-seating, microphone environment is uncomfortable for them, and a significant compromise in order to honour family. Sometimes, they blend in with the crowd. Other times, they need to make it known that they're not davening, that they're really there under duress, and exhibit looks of pain throughout the service.

On one occasion, an extremely observant man sat in the service reading the Sunday New York Times. I considered it a major rabbinic success when he put down the paper a few minutes into my sermon and looked up.

I fully recognize the right of a Jew to determine the religious environment where she or he feels comfortable and to place limits on the modes of Jewish practice that he or she finds acceptable. To be sure, I do the same. But derech eretz and k'vod habriyot enjoin us to keep our reservations private, unless the form of Jewish practice we're avoiding represents a gross violation of Jewish law, theology or morality.

Rabbi Finegold: Not that I agree with such behaviour or theology, but doesn't the individual who openly demonstrates he has checked into the building, but checked out of the service believe that your congregation is a gross violation of Jewish law and theology? He would appear to be saying, "Look, I am here because my cousin, nebach, married a Conservative Jew, and now I have to go to their son's bar mitzvah, but I think this is all heresy, so I'll show how much better I am by reading the paper"? Wouldn't it be better for the family and the kavod of the congregation for you to ask that they not attend such services?

I had an acquaintance who refused to attend conventional Orthodox services, now that there are egalitarian options available that align with his theology. I like this borderline case much better, because we often fall into the trap that anything more observant than us is acceptable while one should not take part in something that one views as less observant because they are just rationalizing an "easier" religion.

What if you had gone to the individual reading the paper and asked him to leave, not because he wasn't respecting the service, but because your congregation only includes those who are inclusive of all others, including women and LGBT individuals? Perhaps the liberal Jewish community needs to articulate that its values of inclusion and modernity are a form of theology that it considers as important as the relationship with God and Jewish practice.

Rabbi Scheim: I agree that one whose attendance takes the form of protest should stay home. A more frequent scenario unfolds at funeral services in the synagogue. Those opposed to the form of Jewish practice in the host synagogue will refuse to step into the sanctuary, and stand in the lobby or the parking lot. I find it hard to imagine how the family is honoured when, at the same time, their chosen place of worship is so disrespected.

It's tempting, I admit, to ask such offending individuals to leave, and in particularly egregious instances, I would be prepared to do so, but part of being welcoming requires admitting those who are unsympathetic to our standards and our practices, as long as their behaviour is not disruptive. ■

Christians and Jews have much in common

Many would say that relations between Judaism and Christianity in Canada have never been better, and with good reason. Canada, a majority Christian nation, scored well on the Anti-Defamation League's recent worldwide index of anti-Semitism. There is robust interfaith dialogue. And, of course, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, an evangelical Christian, stands as one of the Israeli government's strongest allies.

Canadian Christians have also no doubt been influenced in their approach to Jews by Pope Francis, who just under a year ago stated Christians "cannot be anti-Semitic." If that were literally true, Canada would have garnered a better score from the ADL, but the sentiment is still powerful. What else would you expect from a pope who co-wrote a book titled On Heaven and Earth with his Jewish best friend, Rabbi Abraham Skorka?

Pope Francis, who was accompanied by Rabbi Skorka when he made his first trip to Israel earlier this week, has emerged as something of a folk hero/pop star during his short time as Pope. The simplicity of his message has been refreshing, and he has focused on the importance of humility and generosity, two themes that are also central to Judaism. His "who am I to judge?" proclamation about gay people was so profound that it transcended all religious boundaries.

"Who am I to judge" followed from 2010's On Heaven And Earth, where the then-Cardinal Bergoglio wrote: "when one reads Maimonides… and Saint Thomas of Aquinas, two nearly contemporary philosophers, we see that they always start by putting themselves in the position of their adversary in order to understand them; they dialogue from the standpoint of the other." The search for understanding requires that we see beyond ourselves. Therein, the Pope is saying, lies the genesis of religious co-existence.

But it's not always so easy to be understanding. Sometimes, try as we might to see things from another perspective, we fail to find positive insight. That is certainly the case in the aftermath of the shooting at Brussels' Jewish Museum on Saturday that left four people dead. This shocking, tragic act will force some Jews – in Europe especially, but also everywhere else they live, Canada included – to retreat inward, to lose trust.

The Brussels disaster, on the heels of the Toulouse shooting, raises a fundamental question: how safe is Europe for Jews? As Paul Michaels described in last week's CJN, parts of Europe are experiencing a neo-Nazi resurgence. Political parties that either advocate or tolerate anti-Semitism are gaining followers in Hungary, Greece and France, a trend borne out by Sunday's European Parliament elections. According to the ADL's survey, western Europe is 24 per cent anti-Semitic, a full 10 points higher than Canada. In eastern Europe, the number is 34 per cent.

Canadian Jews are fortunate to live in such a tolerant country. European Jews aren't so lucky, and in the aftermath of Brussels, we are reminded of the reasons that many fear for the future of European Jewry. The threat is real and growing. That's why Pope Francis' powerful message that Jews are not the enemy – that, in fact, Christians and Jews have much in common, and plenty to learn from each other – is of such crucial importance. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

The CJN and the memory of the Holocaust

Magdalena Kubow

Today more than ever, the media have an important place in spreading awareness on important issues and upholding the memory of the past. In a recently published academic paper I authored, titled Kanada: The Effect of The Canadian Jewish News and Survivors on the Memory of the Holocaust, I explored the influence that this newspaper had on helping to foster Holocaust memory, commemoration and education when few outlets would.

Historians Harold Troper and Irving Abella exposed the unreceptive attitude toward Jews, and particularly Holocaust survivors, held by gentiles, nativists and government officials, in None is too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe: 1933-1948, but what is less known and more unexpected is the unreceptive attitude of the established Jewish community toward survivors.

The established Jewish community in Canada were not strangers to latent and overt anti-Semitism, and were focusing on becoming fully assimilated into mainstream society. Few in the established community were interested in assisting new Jewish immigrants who stood out as more religious, based on dress and practice, and who were unfamiliar with Canadian language and culture. The eventual integration of survivors into society, supported and facilitated by The CJN, resulted in their participation in defining what the Holocaust meant to the Jewish and wider community.

The CJN was founded in 1960 by M.J. Nurenberger and his wife, Dorothy. It quickly became the leading newspaper of Canadian Jewry and was able to bridge the gap between the established community and survivors by covering and connecting issues both parties felt were important. An objective of The CJN was to show the inter-connectedness of the Canadian Jewish community (such as the maintenance of synagogues), and wider global issues, such as the protection of Israel and the memory of the Holocaust.

Articles such as Duty And Recognition reinforced the responsibility of Toronto synagogues to "keep alive… the spirit of Israel and at the same time to provide strength and sustenance to the people of Israel." The CJN published articles from all over the world, including New York, Israel and Argentina, on issues concerning international Jewry – the rise of neo-Nazism and the protection of Israel.

In response to these issues, Nurenberger wrote in a commentary that the swastika epidemic was not only a Jewish issue but "constitutes a threat to freedom and human dignity the world over… The incidents are minor, but the significance is of major importance." Nurenberger and the position of The CJN understood and used the connection between the Jewish Holocaust and hatemongering.

The tactic of connecting the Holocaust to hatemongering and other genocides, to stress its relevance to a wider audience, was not common until the late 1970s; Nurenberger, as the leader and voice of The CJN, was well ahead of the times in this respect. It is this crucial connection made early on, that the Holocaust, anti-Semitism and hatemongering, became not only a Jewish issue, but an issue that had implications for everyone that set The CJN apart – apart from other newspapers, media outlets, or awareness-raising events.

The CJN was also aware of the plight of survivors (Nurenberger had interviewed Warsaw Ghetto veterans) and aimed to counter the "greenie" stereotype and the suspicion that so many new Jewish immigrants encountered in the established community upon arriving in Canada.

COURTESY OF ATARA NURENBERGER BECK

One survivor of the Warsaw Uprising told Nurenberger he fought against "the indifference of our fellow men. The western governments knew what transpired in Auschwitz." The CJN sought to counter indifference with articles intended to educate Canadian Jewry on the plight of the Jews and articulate the horrors and bravery they witnessed, so that the survivors, to an extent, would not have to.

It is worth reiterating that initially the survivors who did want to speak out about their experience lacked a receptive audience in the 1950s. By 1960, the attitude of The CJN was clearly one of dialogue on the issue of the Holocaust. Although the term Holocaust was used infrequently until 1963, the topic was widely covered.

Besides bringing the Holocaust back into mainstream consciousness and helping to close the rift between the established Jewish community and survivors by presenting a situation that was relevant and significant, The CJN stressed that the rise of neo-Nazism, commemoration and the Adolf Eichmann trial (of 1961) had long-term implications. The events of the early 1960s inspired long-term ambitions in the Canadian Jewish community: the continued commemoration of the Holocaust and empowerment of survivors by focusing on the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, exposure of hidden Nazi criminals and the lobbying for new legislation against the spread of hate propaganda.

If not for the pioneering achievement of The CJN and the Holocaust survivors who politicized important issues and made them resonate with the wider public, Canada's memory and recognition of the Holocaust, legislation on hate crime and school curriculum would be greatly lacking.

Magdalena Kubow is a PhD candidate in the history department of the University of Western Ontario. The Effect of the Canadian Jewish News and Survivors on the Memory of the Holocaust was printed in Holocaust Studies: A Journal of Culture and History. You can read it at: http://vallentinemitchell.metapress.com ■

'Being from a Jewish household I knew I was never going to be a policeman'

Having grown up in Cote-St. Luc, a Montreal suburb Sager described as a "ghettoized" town highly populated by Jews, he wasn't used to standing out as the only Jew in a group.

"I was the first one that they'd ever met. That was a big shock to me. But I was able to relate to them quick enough."

After spending two years in Sudbury doing undercover work for the RCMP drug squad, Sager decided he wanted to do uniform work for the TPS and requested that he be placed in 32 Division – bordered by Steeles and Lawrence avenues, and by the CN Rail line (near Dufferin Street) and Bayview Avenue – because of its large Jewish community.

But despite the large Jewish community 32 Division served, Sager said that when he joined the TPS in 1989, he was still an anomaly.

"I knew that there was a detective in the homicide division that was Jewish, and two other police officers in the city who were Jewish outside this division. Then taking into account a few people I didn't know of, maybe there were 10 Jewish policemen."

More than two decades later, the Jewish demographics in the TPS have not drastically changed. Sager estimated that out of 7,000 TPS officers, there might be only 40 to 50 Jews.

Jacob Berkenblit, a probation officer with the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, said the number of Jews in his field is also relatively low. He said that in his eight years in the field, he's met only three or four other Jews and guessed that there aren't many more working for the province in this role.

The 33-year-old Thornhill, Ont., native said that by the time he entered high school, he knew he wanted to pursue a career in law enforcement.

"After I finished university, I went through the motions of trying to become a police officer… After a couple years, I got a job working at a facility [a detention centre] for youths that offend, where we tried to transition them back into the community," Berkenblit explained.

As he continued to gain experience in other areas of law enforcement, including as a probation officer, a job he has held for the past four years, he discovered that he enjoyed it.

"I work with the aftermath. I work with people who have been through the system, been arrested, have been in jail and in court, and I get to work with them afterward to try to give them a better outcome."

Berkenblit suggested that perhaps the reason there aren't more Jews choosing law enforcement positions is that parents don't typically push children into this line of work."Growing up, you never heard of Jewish parents saying, 'You should be a cop,'" he said.

Sonia Halpern, an English and writing studies professor at the University of Western Ontario, recently wrote a study titled A Yiddishe cop: An investigation into contemporary Jewish issues of police work.

"In Judaism, we tend to associate particular careers, like law, medicine, accounting, dentistry… with Jewish careers, as it were. It's interesting to me that police work, much of the time, deals with medical issues, with legal issues, with justice, so it deals with a lot of the same issues that the so-called Jewish professions deal with, and yet, it's not really advocated as a profession that Jews should pursue," Halpern said in an interview.

In her study, Halpern highlighted a number of reasons she believes Jews avoid police work. For one, police officers belong to a para-militaristic organization, the kind of groups that historically mistreated European Jews. Jewish culture also places high value on education and intellectualism, and policing was not traditionally a career that required a post-secondary education. Another factor Halpern highlighted was that policing could be dangerous, which conflicts with the values Jews place on the sanctity of human life.

But Sager argues that perhaps the most compelling reason more Jewish young adults don't pursue careers in law enforcement is because their worried parents try to deter them.

"Being from a Jewish household, I knew I was never going to be a policeman. My parents were dead set against it, and no one from my community had ever become a policeman."

Sager said his parents pushed him along a more traditional path toward medicine, or dentistry, or law, or even the family business.

"I have three siblings – two brothers and one sister. My father was in the shmatte business, and they are there with him. I had a job waiting for me, which paid a lot more than I'm getting paid now, but that wasn't my dream. My dream was to be a policeman," he said.

"My parents tried to dissuade me from being a policeman by saying, 'You're going to be living in the poorest area of Montreal, you won't be able to afford this and that because policemen are paid so poorly.'"

He said he decided to look into the issue further by utilizing a vocational service to learn more about a career in law enforcement, and he learned that, actually, the police services pay very well.

"My parents are still sitting shivah," he said, laughing. "But it's funny, because my parents are very proud of me… although it wasn't so apparent at the beginning… They wanted to dissuade me because it's such a dangerous profession."

Berkenblit had a similar experience with his worried parents, but they were less vocal about whether he should or should not have entered the law enforcement field.

"My mom was very worried about me becoming a cop, and she is still worried about me. I think my mom thinks… I'm in danger at all times. She'll ask me, 'Are you OK?'" he said, adding that his clients, who are as young as 12 years old, have committed offences including something as minor as petty theft, and as serious as murder.

"She knows that we're dealing with [dangerous people] but… my parents never pushed me one way or the other. My parents were never the type of parents that told me to be a doctor or a lawyer, like a typical Jewish boy. Nothing is wrong with that type of work, but I never gravitated toward it," Berkenblit said.

"I was too interested in being on the front lines rather than being behind a book. I'm educated, but I wasn't interested in being in a work environment like a doctor or a lawyer, because it didn't appeal to me." ■

What are the boundaries of pro-Israel solidarity?

Shira Herzog

It's often called "loving criticism" of Israel, and the much-debated question is whether such a phenomenon can exist. If criticism requires moral integrity and detachment, how does that square with concepts such as the love of – and solidarity with—the people of Israel?

In a thought-provoking essay published in Ha'aretz last month, Eva Ilouz, the renowned Israeli sociologist, opened the kimono on this question philosophically and politically. In so doing, she drew on philosophers and writers such as Euripides, Gershom Sholem, Hannah Arendt, Albert Camus, Michel Foucault and Michael Walzer. It's a feast for the mind, but it provokes a series of weighty questions.

The fundamental theme of the essay is whether the Jewish critic is obligated to consider that extra, indefinable but palpable quality of "ahavat Israel," love of the Jewish People, which sometimes requires refraining from the truth due to "herzenstakt" – the duty of the heart. Ahavat Israel, which first appears as a biblical injunction to "love thy neighbour" in Leviticus 19, is best associated with Rabbi Akiva, who sought to control erupting infighting among Jewish sects after the Second Temple's destruction. Ilouz contemporizes the concept by quoting Gershom Sholem's criticism of Hannah Arendt's "heartlessness" in reporting on the Eichmann trial, specifically on the grounds that she lacked ahavat Israel. Arendt didn't deny this, arguing instead, that a true intellectual needed distance and independence to voice her opinions.

For Jewish critics in the second half of the 20th century, ahavat Israel had become a virtual gateway to legitimacy, claims Ilouz. Criticism of Israel is only acceptable if it's permeated with an embrace of the country and its people's history. The measure of acceptable solidarity isn't always clearly defined, resulting in an emotional demand for "hypersolidarity." Otherwise, the Jewish critic is subject to accusations of being anti-Israel or anti-Zionist and runs the risk of public excoriation for his views. Ilouz invokes a recent example of this dynamic. Journalist Ari Shavit's book, My Promised Land, is infused with hypersolidarity. This has made his chapter on Jewish violence in Lydda during the 1948 war palatable to the book's prime audience – North American liberal Jewish readers.

Ilouz attributes this insular perspective to history, but more recently, to the institutionalization of Zionist groups, as well as the memory of the Shoah as a key component of secular Jewish identity and the prevalence of U.S. interest group politics. Each is worthy of independent discussion, but together, they've contributed to the difficulty of discussing Jewish Diaspora institutions and Israeli policies.

Precisely because of this, today, it's important to open our own kimono and discuss changes in North American Jewry. The Open Hillel movement challenging Hillel's restrictions on speakers' credentials and the much-criticized Conference of Presidents' recent vote against admitting J Street are just two examples of the need to have a new debate. I believe this can be done because of allegiance to – and not in spite of – ahavat Israel.

Hypersolidarity can close down a conversation, because it can become a no-win, futile ideological debate. So we need to determine the boundaries of solidarity. What does it mean to be "pro-Israel" today? Is it supporting all members of the coalition? Is it support for laws that will weaken Israel's democracy by giving even greater preference to its Jewish national component? Is it supporting a prime-minister-sponsored law to weaken the presidency in order to influence the results of the next election? And is supporting groups that want to challenge such moves an "anti-Israel" act? Surely we can go beyond such simplistic definitions. As Ilouz underscores: "If the contemporary Jewish intellectual has a task, it's to unveil the conditions under which Jewish solidarity should or should not be accepted, debunked or embraced." ■

Bible contest reminds us that we're people of the Book

Daniel Held

On Yom Ha'atzmaut Eitan Amos, a Toronto Grade 12 student won the International Bible Competition held in Jerusalem. While Eitan's win is only the second time a Canadian has finished first, we have a proud history in the competition.

Each year in February, regional competitions are held across the country. Hundreds of middle and high school students from day and supplementary schools write the first round of tests. The winners from these regions move on to the national competition, which alternates between Toronto and Montreal. This year, more than 150 students from across the country came together for two days of competition. With each level of competition, the number of chapters covered and the complexity of the questions increases. For the first time, I attended the award banquet on the final day of competition. Nerves were high and emotions were raw as students fretted about their placing.

The winners of the national competition travel to Israel for the international competition, the finals of which take place on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The competition is a celebration of Bible study. For months, students pore over the hundreds of chapters assigned for that year's competition. Their attention to detail and concern for accuracy is a lesson to all of us. During my own (incredibly unsuccessful) childhood run at the competition, I sat with a friend reading, re-reading and taking notes. Two of the winners of this year's national competition, who will travel to Israel together next year, were study partners, motivating and challenging one another other along the way.

In truth, the competition is about much more than Bible.

Founded by David Ben-Gurion in the early years of the state, the competition is a marker of what it means to be the Jewish People.

In 2001, a student I taught made it to the international competition. I happened to be in Israel at the time and he gave me a coveted ticket to the final round. Taking place in the Jerusalem Theatre on Yom Ha'atzmaut, the final round is broadcast live on national television, and the prime minister asks one of the final questions. I have a clear image of Ariel Sharon, seated among the crowd, standing up to ask his question on a seemingly obscure section of the Bible. Rest assured, the contestants knew the answer.

Four years ago, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's son, Avner, was one of the finalists. He answered the first two questions correctly, but stumbled on the question asked by his father. While the prime minister would usually write his own question, due to the circumstances, Netanyahu's question was written by the moderator but asked by the prime minister.

The central place of the Bible competition on Yom Ha'atzmaut has always struck me as a profound message. On a day of celebration, when Israeli television could be focused on countless other issues and the prime minister could be attending hundreds of other events, both make place for a group of high school students competing on their knowledge of Bible. Unlike the National Spelling Bee, which is televised in the United States, the Bible competition serves as an important symbol of the state, underlining the meaning of Israel as a Jewish state.

Similarly, the competition highlights the role of the Bible as a unifying feature of our people. In our regional and national competitions, students from across denominations and from both day and supplementary schools compete. In the international competition, competitors come from across North and South America, Australia, South Africa, Europe, the former Soviet Union and Israel. While biblical interpretation can, at times, pull us apart, in these instances it unites a diverse group of learners in friendly, though heated, competition.

Eitan Amos deservedly won accolades for his performance in this year's international competition. His knowledge of the Bible likely puts most of us to shame. Beyond promoting rote knowledge, however, the competition reminds us that we truly are the people of the Book. ■

The power of a minyan

Jean M. Gerber

What do you think of when you think of a minyan? Ten men? Ten people? A prayer congregation? To me a minyan is a group with whom I pray, one that's most deeply felt and needed when, for example, we say Kaddish for family and friends. They are 10 people who know grief and loss, who will provide acceptance and understanding.

But the Power of Ten is not a prayer group, but 10 people in Victoria, B.C.

And it all started with a play.

We see the homeless bundled into sleeping bags and blankets, asking for spare change. Not content with wringing his hands over the sight, Victoria's Belfry Theatre director Michael Shamata wanted to make a more public statement about homelessness. He commissioned dramatist Joel Bernbaum to write "documentary" theatre, with dialogue created from people's actual words.

Bernbaum's theatre combines his training as a journalist and actor to use both in bringing social issues to the fore. And boy is the issue of homelessness ever an issue!

Their play, Home is a Beautiful Word, uses dialogue based on some 500 interviews Bernbaum conducted with street people, city officials and even the mayor of Victoria.

I interviewed Bernbaum by phone from Saskatoon, where he's based. What, I asked, prompted him to do this play and what effect does his Jewish background have on the play?

He got right to the heart of the matter: "We are talking during Passover with its stories of suffering, when we should recall how important it is to see the suffering of others." The Jewish community, he went on, is good at reacting on a larger scale, but needs to seek out opportunities where they can move away from their comfort level. "Art" is a good trigger, because it gets to an emotional place.

One street person challenged him, "Do you think as you walk past us that each and every one of us is somebody's child?"

Ouch, I thought.

Bernbaum went on: "Our values are only as strong as how we use them. We have a responsibility as human beings. The need to help our fellow humans is increasing." Those invisible to us would become real people on his stage.

It just wasn't on the stage, but in the street. The Power of Ten is a group of 10 people who decided to do something radical. They chose a street person and mentored him through a year of classes, helping him to find a home and acquire long-suppressed life skills, including learning to drive. In short, they went from art to action.

I asked Bernbaum: "Can a play change us? Can it make an invisible situation, visible, and can we then act on it?"

Wow, what an answer he gave. "When well done, yes! People crave this human connection. This theatre [which he calls verbal theatre] is the way to reach our community. It allows the artist and the audience to understand the world better," a chance to live our values.

To Bernbaum, the minyan represents a community of those values: the Power of Ten is, in Bernbaum's words "prayer as tangible action."

(A sidebar: Vancouver has been a part of an ambitious national program to determine whether the homeless and hard to house can benefit from being housed with support systems. Surprise! It's better for those living on the street to have a roof over their heads. I shudder to think how much money was spent on this no-brainer, but that's just me.)

The play Home is a Beautiful Word and the Power of 10 minyan deserve all the praise they can get. Making a person sleeping in a doorway something more than a pile of rags seems to me the essence of what a minyan can mean. It's a way to community. A way to reach out. A way to help people find their way home. ■

Herb Gray got results

Ron Csillag

Columnist Michael Taube falls into the easy and clichéd when he writes on why former deputy prime minister Herb Gray did not merit a state funeral (CJN, May 14). Yes, Gray was dull, stolid and, well, grey. Those, of course, are not reasons for denying him a state funeral. But when Taube asserts that Gray, in his 40 years as a Liberal MP and through 11 cabinet portfolios, "didn't introduce significant political and economic policies" and "had little to do with important legislation," he's being facile, inaccurate and a little churlish.

In chronological order, Gray, an economic nationalist, stirred up controversy in 1972 with a foreign-investment policy review that led to the release the Gray Report. The study set the stage for the creation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which ensured that foreign investors brought significant benefits to Canada.

Later, as consumer and corporate affairs minister, Gray introduced an unusual piece of legislation, the Anti-Profiteering Bill, which aimed to halt gouging of consumers by giving the government power to roll back price increases that produced "above customary profits." The bill was later dropped, but Gray's heart was in the right place. Of course, as a conservative, Taube doubtless would recoil at this level of government intervention in the private sector.

But surely Taube must approve, even if grudgingly, of Gray's legendary 1980 rescue of Chrysler Corp. As industry minister in the Trudeau government, he negotiated federal loan guarantees that were widely credited with helping to save the Windsor-based car maker, along with some 10,000 well-paying jobs. It may stand as Gray's singular achievement and as one of the most successful public bailouts in Canadian history.

Later, as solicitor general, a job he wasn't keen on, Gray heeded calls for tougher treatment of violent criminals while also emphasizing the importance of rehabilitation and reducing the root causes of crime.

More quietly, as Jean Chrétien's House leader, Gray did more to bolster parliamentary democracy that anyone at the time. In a little-noticed shift in 1996, he introduced measures that would refer bills to committee before second reading, rather than after. Sounds dry, but it allowed MPs to play a greater role in crafting legislation, because a bill that passes second reading implies approval-in-principle.

Later that year, he used the new legislation to amend the Canada Elections Act, creating a permanent register of electors and shortening the election period by several weeks.

As National Post columnist John Ivison asked in his tribute to Gray: "Can anyone imagine the Conservatives [today] amending the rules unilaterally to give backbenchers on all sides of the House more say in the legislative process? Even their own MPs believe they have acted like 'tone-deaf bullies' with their version of the Elections Act."

Green party Leader Elizabeth May, perhaps buffeted by emotion following his death, said Gray, in 2001, "saved" the Kyoto environmental protocol. That could be hyperbole, but we know Gray was certainly onside when it came to the accords, from which the federal Tories withdrew in 2011.

Gray also headed the wrenching file on residential school abuse, working with aboriginal groups to successfully settle outstanding claims and begin a healing of past wrongs.

Also outside the strict legislative process, Gray frequently slagged his own government, in public, for not doing enough to counter the Arab economic boycott of Israel. It was also Gray who persuaded human rights activist Irwin Cotler to take up the case of Soviet prisoner of conscience Natan Sharansky, and he brokered a meeting between Pierre Trudeau and Sharansky's wife, Avital.

It adds up – perhaps not to a state funeral, but to a list of solid achievements over a half-century of which Taube is either sadly unaware or blithely ignores. Yes, as Taube writes, Gray "had a dull personality and didn't stand head and shoulders above his political colleagues, Liberal or otherwise." He never sought to. For this eminently humble and decent man, what mattered were results. And he got plenty. ■

Ve'ahavta campaign running until end of the year

Drive aims to move Jews to help others

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless van outreach project operates two vans in downtown Toronto.

Ve'ahavta is hoping its new $1.5-million fundraising campaign, It Is A Jewish Cause, will stimulate discussion about what responsibility Jews have for communities outside their own.

The money raised by the campaign, which runs until Dec. 31, will be earmarked for four Ve'ahavta programs: its outreach vans for the homeless, its street academy, a Jewish/aboriginal health program in Northern Ontario and a new youth leadership program, said Robyn Segall, director of communications and operations for Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Volunteer and logistical teams distribute food, clothing and hygiene supplies to clients, and provide referrals to self-improvement and counselling facilities.

The Ve'ahavta Street Academy (VSA) is an eight-week program, in partnership with George Brown College, for people who live on or near the streets of Toronto. VSA helps marginalized people access education as a way to become self-sufficient.

Ve'ahavta's recently announced a health promotion initiative, Bri'ut (Hebrew for "health"), in conjunction with seven First Nation communities in Kenora, Ont. Bri'ut aims to improve the long-term physical and mental health of aboriginal populations in Northern Ontario by strengthening the delivery of community-based health programs.

The campaign It Is A Jewish Cause is "expressing that homelessness and aboriginal health are some of the causes the Jewish community should be concerned with," Segall said. "As a people, it is our responsibility to help others in need."

She said that "we have experienced loss of land and culture, just like aboriginal people. It makes sense for us to work closely with our aboriginal brothers and sisters."

Ve'ahavta, which focuses on poverty alleviation, is strongly based on Jewish values, yet the organization is universal in nature, she said. It helps "all those who are in need, regardless of their faith because we were, too, among strangers. In our history, we would have benefitted greatly from a response from outside our community. We feel we have a duty to respond to people here in Toronto and on a national or international scale."

Ve'ahavta has provided disaster relief in Haiti, Haifa, the Philippines and Pakistan. In Mali, Ve'ahavta partners with Muso, a group that aims to eliminate preventable deaths in the world's most impoverished communities. Ve'ahavta distributes Kinder Kits, packs of school supplies, to children in Canada and to countries around the world, including in Israel.

Although Ve'ahavta's local clientele is mainly non-Jewish, Segall stressed that there are more Jews on the streets than people would like to think. Ve'ahavta holds an annual community Passover seder and operates joint programs with Jewish Family & Child.

Segall pointed out that poverty is relative to where you live. For five days recently, Ve'ahavta staff took up the challenge of trying to eat and drink on $1.75 a day, as part of Live Below the Line, a global movement that raises money to combat extreme poverty.

"[Living on] $1.75 a day is way too low for someone in Toronto," Segall said. In Toronto, one of the most expensive cities in Canada, "to be able to pay first and last month rent for an apartment, you need a good job.

"Many people in Toronto are at risk of becoming homeless. They could be couch surfing or living in a shelter. They are unable to secure stable housing. It's easy for people on that shaky line to fall economically quickly."

Avrum Rosensweig, president and CEO of Ve'ahavta and a CJN columnist, said that by working with the homeless and marginalized, "we live up to the Jewish value of 'love your neighbour' and we also introduce ourselves to the world, so they can understand first hand who we are."

It's a Jewish responsibility to work with the stranger, he said. "While we're doing it, it lets non-Jews know who we are and that we are good people, and we break down stereotypes through our work." ■

JVS event looks at 'our youth, our future'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

When Len Jillard was 16 years old, he got a job working behind the counter at a McDonald's restaurant in his hometown of London, Ont.

It proved to be a fortuitous career move. It's been a few years since then – he declined to reveal how many – but today, Jillard is a senior vice-president and "chief people officer" at McDonald's Restaurants of Canada.

His case is not unusual, Jillard explained at last week's Strictly Business lunch event, sponsored by JVS Toronto. Ninety per cent of the restaurant's managers once worked in the eateries, as did half of the company's franchise owners. Overall, 65 per cent of the company's top management, including its last three presidents, have worked at different positions inside the restaurants, he said.

Jillard presented the catalogue of statistics as part of the theme of this year's lunch event – "Our youth, our future" – attended by 345 people at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

Some 70 per cent of McDonald's 85,000 employees are 24 or younger, he said, and half are younger than 18.

> I'm very excited about youth today, the next generation of Canadians.
> Len Jillard
> McDonald's Canada

The young people employed by McDonald's fit its corporate culture and brand.

Jillard noted that during McDonald's most recent "national hiring day," held in April, more than 40,000 people applied for jobs at the restaurant chain, up from 33,000 during the company's first national hiring day four years ago. Of the 40,000, 6,200 got jobs, he added.

Nevertheless, as far as current youth employment goes, the overall national statistics are somewhat grim. Youth employment stands at more than 20 per cent, three times the national rate. For young people new to Canada, the prospects of gainful employment are even bleaker, at closer to 30 per cent unemployment, according to JVS.

Jillard rejected common stereotypes that young people today are lazier than earlier generations, are uncommunicative or have a sense of entitlement. Similar attributes were often attributed to his generation, too, he quipped. "I'm very excited about youth today, the next generation of Canadians."

Business people should believe in and invest in young workers, he suggested, while imparting another word of advice: "You're a product of your decisions, not conditions."

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson, JVS' newly installed president and CEO, said the youth unemployment rate "is way too high. It's unacceptable."

JVS, a non-profit agency that provides career and employment services, is constantly looking for new and innovative ways to support job seekers and match them up with potential employers, she said.

She discounted suggestions that today's young people are not as committed to working as previous generations. The young people she's met certainly are, and last year, JVS helped more than 6,000 of them – some underemployed, others with difficult personal issues – find work. Even JVS' other function of psychologically assessing children in schools is consistent with the organization's main mission of "helping them get a great start," she added.

JVS honoured several of its clients and corporate partners with its annual awards. Calandra Rowe, who today works as a nurse manager at Qualicare, received JVS' Youth Award. Julia Yael Alekseev, an immigrant from Israel, received the Newcomer Youth Award. She works as an administrative assistant at Dimar Canada.

Ralph Shepherd, a franchisee, and Jason Hagerman, the operations manager of a Tim Hortons restaurant in Richmond Hill, received the Inspirational Award by taking on eight JVS clients from the agency's Ability Works and Asperger's Job Readiness programs.

Sporting Life, a well-known retailer, received the Building New Relationships Award for hiring 15 young people following a job fair organized by JVS Toronto.

Georgian College was granted the Post-Secondary Educational Award. ■

IsraAID team in South Korea following ferry boat disaster

UJA Federation partner organization is "training the trainers"

By Daniel Horowitz

On April 15th, 476 passengers, mostly wide-eyed and enthusiastic teenage high school students, boarded the MV Sewol in Incheon, South Korea, for what was a highly anticipated, end-of-the-year celebratory class excursion.

Less than 12 hours later, what was supposed to have been a dream day for the youngsters turned into a nightmare of unprecedented scope, as the ferry capsized off the southwestern island of Jindo, sending more than 300 teenagers to their deaths.

In the wake of the tragic news, IsraAID, a partner organization of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, did what they do best; they came up with a strategic plan to assist the affected community and immediately sent a team of professionals to help on the ground and to "train the trainers".

During the past few weeks, members of IsraAID have been conducting intensive trauma care seminars to over 230 Korean social workers, community counselors, psychologists and psychiatrists who are part of the national and regional government task force which addresses the emotional needs of the community in both the disaster area in Jindo Island and the community in Ansan city.

An IsraAID team member trains a Korean social worker.

Looking to the future, IsraAID is also developing an intervention work plan for the next two years to properly provide professionalized tools to its government and non-government partners. The trickle affect would initially focus on the families but would expand to help the community surrounding the families and eventually would reach tens of thousands of people across Korea through IsraAID's TOT (Training of Trainers' model).

"With a tragedy such as the MV Sewol, the psychological effects are multi-layered, as the survivors try to rebuild lives that have been irrevocably shattered," said Shachar Zahavi, Founding Director, IsraAID. "Doctors who have been treating the teenage survivors say that 20 percent of them have experienced signs of post-traumatic stress disorder, as well as severe 'survivor's guilt', and could require long-term counseling and psychiatric help. This situation requires far more than merely a band-aid solution, which is why IsraAID is intervening over the next two years, to ensure that Korean professionals have all the tools necessary to assist these youngsters rebuild their lives and peace of mind."

"UJA Federation is proud to have been one of the founding supporters of IsraAid," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "We have partnered with them in support of their efforts to be the face of the Israeli people in disaster relief around the world. Israelis have learned to turn aside tragedy and work for the good of all mankind. That's why it's particular gratifying for UJA Federation and our supporters in this great Jewish community to see IsraAID put those lessons to work for the people of Korea."

Genetic research: one thing leads to another

plungen@thecjn.ca

There's an idiom used in popular culture that appears to also have an application in science as well: one thing leads to another.

It certainly holds true in the research conducted by Dr. Karl Skorecki, director of nephrology and molecular medicine at the Technion faculty of medicine in Haifa. A fun and educational project for undergrads to study the paternal gene that distinguished kohanim, the Jewish priestly group, through the generations led to further research into the genetic disposition of various peoples to develop kidney disease. That led to further genetic research into commonalities held by Jews in disparate parts of the world.

In the end, or more specifically, as of now, the research shows that Jews and putative Jews hold genetic markers that can be traced back 2,000 to 3,000 years to the Levant, the region that includes Israel.

What's more, some people who are not Jews hold the same genetic markers. In the Iberian peninsula, where Spain and Portugal are located, about 20 per cent of the population carry Jewish genetic markers, suggesting large numbers of Conversos – Jews who converted to Christianity rather than face expulsion or death – started families there, he said.

Which makes for an irony of biblical proportions, as a recent ADL survey found that 29 per cent of the Spanish population, or about 11 million people, harbour anti-Semitic attitudes, higher than the 24 per cent found in western Europe overall.

Skorecki was in Toronto last week to deliver the University of Toronto faculty of medicine's annual Sackler Lecture, in which he discussed his work on the genetics of kidney disease.

Dr. Karl Skorecki PAUL LUNGEN PHHOTO

> As a nephrologist, I and colleagues noticed that the people of sub-Saharan ancestry, including in the United States, have four to five times more kidney disease than the general population

Skorecki also met local supporters of the Technion, and he promoted the student exchange program between the University of Toronto and the Haifa-based university. He also gave a public lecture on the genetics of the Jewish people.

For Skorecki, the U of T lecture was particularly meaningful. A native of Toronto who attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Skorecki graduated from the U of T before moving to Israel in 1995.

Skorecki said he began looking into the genetic component of kidney disease in the 1990s. His findings into the genetic markers carried by kohanim – whether in Lithuania, Morocco or Iraq – gave him the tools to further his research into kidney disease.

"As a nephrologist, I and colleagues noticed that the people of sub-Saharan ancestry, including in the United States, have four to five times more kidney disease than the general population. This bothered me," he said, noting that it's "a death sentence" in parts of Africa.

When he studied Ethiopian Jews who had moved to Israel, he did not find that same genetic predisposition to kidney ailments.

A gene was identified. "In many parts of Africa, a variant of this gene rose to be common in sub-Saharan Africa, because it conferred protection versus certain infections. For the descendants of those who survived the infections, it caused risk for kidney disease," Skorecki said.

His team at the Technion is now trying to develop drugs to neutralize that effect. So, too, is a group at Harvard University. They're in a friendly race to come up with a solution first. It's a race that has attracted the interest of a couple of major pharmaceutical companies, which are interested in commercializing their findings. He declined to name them.

"We're making a lot of progress, fast," he added. "I'm excited."

As for the genetics of the Jewish People, Skorecki said DNA markers can be used as supplementary tools to retrace the movements and shared history of Diaspora Jewish communities.

Take the Georgian Jews, for instance. Georgian Jews have an oral tradition that claims they are the oldest Diaspora community in the world, going back some 2,500 years.

As far as Skorecki's research shows, they're right.

In Mumbai, the Bene Israel demonstrate a paternal DNA marker signal linking them to the Levant.

The Bnei Menashe, a large group of people living on the Burma-India border, have also been tested, but the sample size was too small and the results are inconclusive, he said.

The Lemba people, who live in Zimbabwe, have "an oral tradition that conformed perfectly to the DNA," he said.

As the tradition has it, their ancestors left Judea long ago, travelling south to the Hadhramaut, modern Yemen. From there, they travelled down the east coast of Africa by boat, landed and moved inland, marrying local Bantu women.

Tests of the male genetic markers found a paternal link back to the Levant, Skorecki said.

All that is very interesting, he acknowledged, but it's not what makes a Jew today. Jewish identity is defined as metaphysical, religious and cultural, not biological.

After all, King David was the grandson of a Moabite woman and he was Jewish, Skorecki said. ■

Israeli self-defence program comes to Toronto

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A former Bathurst Jewish Community Centre martial arts instructor has developed Commando Krav Maga, or CKM, a practical hand-to-hand self-defence system that's based on Krav Maga, the Israeli military's self-defence system.

He and one of his former students have gone on to popularize CKM. It's the "most in-demand defence system worldwide," said Ilan Rosenberg.

CKM cuts out self-defence techniques that are too complex to be carried out in real-life situations, and a combatant's size and weight is irrelevant, he said.

Rosenberg enrolled in judo and jujitsu classes at the Bathurst JCC (now the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre) in 1978, at the age of 12. His teacher was Moni Aizik, a then recent immigrant from Israel.

Rosenberg, now 48, a solid, muscular man, trained with Aizik for more than a decade and won Ontario judo and jujitsu championships in 1993. "It was after that that Moni asked me to teach at his school," Rosenberg said.

That's when he began learning CKM from Aizik, who had developed the self-defence system over 20 years.

Ilan Rosenberg

Rosenberg said that Aizik fought in an Israeli special forces unit of 60 soldiers during the Yom Kippur War. Aizik's unit was ambushed by hundreds of Syrian commandos, who were larger than most Arab fighters. Only five Israelis, among them Aizik, survived. He was aware that he lived through the battle because of his large size, Rosenberg said.

"Moni realized that the Israeli martial arts system needed to be changed," Rosenberg said. The Israeli military agreed and asked Aizik to "evolve" its close-quarter combat system.

Rosenberg persuaded Aizik to take his system, a simplified version of Krav Maga in which a fighter's success isn't related to weight or size, around the world. In 2004, it was given the name Commando Krav Maga.

Currently, some 800 CKM instructors, male and female, are active worldwide, in the United States, China, Japan, Italy, Greece, Chile and other countries. Rosenberg offers instructor training in Canada through the Commando Krav Maga Academy.

He teaches traditional martial arts at his Rosenberg Centre for Defensive Sciences (www.rosenbergcentre.org) in Newmarket, Ont., and holds self-defence classes for children, but CKM is strictly for men and women who are over 15, he said.

Students have to be mature, because unlike traditional martial arts, CKM has no rules. "We go for the eyes, throat, groin. We use techniques that can do serious damage," he said. "We can break legs and arms."

However, summarizing CKM's philosophy, he added, "We look for peace while preparing for war."

Rosenberg said in cases where a fight is unavoidable, CKM students are instructed to "engage, cause maximum damage and disengage. Don't punish – they can pull out a weapon."

He said he loves traditional martial arts, but they are "sports. I realized they aren't right for street fighting with guns and knives. Today, there are multiple attackers and many of them are carrying weapons."

Rosenberg, the highest level CKM instructor in the world today, has an ongoing contract with the Canadian Forces' Joint Task Force 2, a special operations unit responsible for counterterrorism, to provide soldiers with training.

"Their hand-to-hand combat needed to be upgraded big time," he said. "The group is extremely athletic and focused. They picked it up quickly."

Along with teaching, Rosenberg has worked in dozens of movies as a fight choreographer and stuntman, including Red, Still Seas, Nakita, Covert Affairs and Robocop.

Rosenberg is teaching a 12-week introductory CKM course in North York, a "civilian version" for the Jewish community, he said. He mentioned the recent murders in Kansas City, at the JCC there and at a Jewish retirement community. "It's a very anti-Semitic world," he said, "and we have to be able to defend ourselves." ■

26th Anniversary Gala Reception

Honoring the Israeli Air Force, Canada's Mahal Heroes & the 40th Anniversary of the Yom Kippur War

General Ben Eliyahu
Keynote Speaker

Born and raised in Jerusalem, Eitan Ben-Eliahu served in the Israeli Air Force (IAF) for 38 years, and was the IAF's Commander in Chief (1996-2000). Ben-Eliahu was involved in some of the IAF's most important operations as Squadron Commander of a group of F-4 Phantoms in the Yom Kippur War and as a fighter pilot in the 1981 mission to destroy Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor. Ben-Eliahu is a leading analyst and commentator on regional and international defense and security issues.

Mahalniks

The Mahal Air Force volunteers provided crucial aid to the fledgling IAF in the 1948 War of Independence. From 1947 to 1949 more than 4,400 volunteers from 56 different countries, including many non-Jews, came to defend and fight for an independent State of Israel. These volunteers were recognized as a primary reason for Israel's victory over five invading Arab Armies. Therefore, CIJR is proud to be honoring the Mahal, and to invite Mahal veterans to accept the honor for those who are no longer, or who cannot be, with us.

Demand for cyber-security growing

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Yuval Elovici, one of Israel's leading experts in cyber-security technology, was in Toronto earlier this month to talk about the importance of investing in this developing field.

Elovici, director of Telkom Innovation Laboratories at Ben-Gurion University (BGU), and co-founder of Titanium Core, a cyber-security company, was invited by the Canadian Associates of BGU to talk about how the Be'er Sheva-area university is leading the charge in developing technologies to protect businesses, individuals and governments from cyber-attackers.

"There is a huge demand in this industry. The government decided that cyber-security is going to be one of the five growth sectors of Israel. There are many startup companies in Israel focusing on cyber-security, there are many international companies that are opening branches in Israel, like IBM," Elovici said.

He said these companies are looking to recruit hundreds of employees and BGU is looking to train them.

"We decided two years ago to start a master's degree in cyber-security and we also give them courses... to give them the proper background that any cyber- security expert should have," he said.

Elovici added that the Israeli government's National Cyber Bureau is promoting cyber-security in Israel, and along with China and Russia, Israel has the potential to be a leader in the field.

"They decided to open a cyber-security centre in each academic institute that wants it. They are opening a centre in Ben Gurion University and in Tel Aviv University. They invested 30 million NIS over three years and we need to match it. It's going to allow us to do research, not tailored to the needs of the funders of our research. Today, all of our research is funded by companies, organizations, who tell us what they need. We want to try to develop very advanced cyber-security mechanisms that are going to be relevant in the next several years, not what is relevant to the next quarter," Elovici said.

During his lecture at the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, Elovici spoke about the latest trends on how cyber- attackers are operating, how they launch targeted attacks.

He said one of the trends is that an attacker will try to obtain a specific document from a company – for example, a financial document from IBM that is scheduled for release in three days –rather than try to spread a virus throughout the entire company.

"In three days, they have no value, but today, they have a huge value," he said.

Lag b'Omer buddies

The annual Lag b'Omer – Great Jewish Family Festival was held May 18 in Earl Bales Park. The event was organized by Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) of Ontario and Tzivos Hashem Canada, and featured music, rides, games, food and a traditional Lag b'Omer bonfire. Pictured with a guy in chicken costume are, from left, JRCC founder Rabbi Yoseph Y. Zaltzman, MP Mark Adler, Councillor James Pasternak and Rabbi Yonah Vilenkin of Tzivos Hashem Canada.

Yuval Elovici speaking about cyber-security threats at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation

'It's the perfect crime'

"The major reason for cyber-attacks today is for financial profit... Today there is a business model behind it. On the other hand, it is the only type of crime you can imagine, where the chance that someone is going to catch you is almost zero. This is one of the biggest challenges in cyber-security – how to identify the attacker is very complicated. It's the perfect crime... They have nothing to lose."

The best defence, he said, is to create financial obstacles for the attackers to minimize the potential gain.

"In cyber-crime, there is a cost to launching an attack. And the cost depends on the security measures that the organization is going to put. If the organization is going to put many security measurements, the cost of launching the attack is going to be much higher," he explained.

"We need to create a situation in which the cost for launching the attack is higher than the benefit from obtaining the data. Eventually we will de-motivate the attacker from launching an attack."

He said small businesses often don't have the resources to install sophisticated cyber-security solutions and this can be problematic for bigger corporations.

For example, when Turkey launched a cyber-attack against Israeli Internet sites in 2011 in retaliation for Israel's interception of a Turkish ship headed for Gaza the previous year, they failed to penetrate bigger companies, but succeeded in attacking a popular pizza chain's website, obtaining customers' user names and passwords.

"What happens is that these customers usually use the same usernames and passwords in other, more advanced organizations," he said.

"The fact that attackers can obtain information from the weakest links, from small [businesses] that can't protect themselves, eventually allows them to obtain a back door to bigger companies."

Elovici warned that smartphones are also popular targets for cyber-attackers.

"The main motivation behind compromising a smartphone is that a smartphone is a device that holds three types of information," he said.

"In mobile phones, people are storing a lot of confidential information. Secondly, in many cases, the mobile phone has credentials to access corporate data. People use their phones to read [corporate] emails, to access corporate files, so once you compromise a mobile phone, you can access everything that the mobile phone can access. The third type of information is information gathered from their environment. Through the microphone, if you can manage to activate the microphone during a confidential meeting, you can collect information from that meeting."

Elovici said that best way to protect oneself from being targeted is to build a strong defence.

"I strongly recommend to everyone to install as many tools as possible that are available in the market." ■

Trampoline club defends rejection of Jewish camps

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@cjnews.ca
MONTREAL

A recreational trampoline centre in Laval, Que. remains firm in its policy of no longer accepting Jewish camps as clients because they have had "too many problems" with them in the past, but it claims it's not being discriminatory.

Club de Trampoline Acrosport Barani, which has been at the centre of a controversy since refusing a reservation from a Jewish day camp on May 15 – explicitly because it was Jewish – posted an explanation of the incident on its Facebook page three days later.

"We do not reject the Jewish community to come to our place. We refuse camps that are not able to respect our regulations," the unsigned statement reads.

The company, which says it has been around for more than 30 years, reiterates that it is justified in refusing to do business with those groups with which it has had a bad experience due to "unpaid bills or bills paid several months late, failure to comply with the regulations (children and chaperones) and requests impossible for us to fulfill (e.g. prayer room). We can no longer accept or accommodate certain groups in our facilities. It is a question of safety first and foremost."

That response is not satisfactory for the director of the rejected camp, Rabbi Levi Raskin of Camp Ohr Menachem, which is run by Beth Chabad in Côte St. Luc. He recorded and released on the Internet an excerpt of his May 15 telephone conversation with a woman who works at Acrosport.

In the recording, he tries to make a reservation for a single visit by the campers for this summer, after a camp staff member earlier that day had tried unsuccessfully to do so.

The woman repeats that Acrosport is not making reservations. When Rabbi Raskin asks why, she asks the name of the camp, and he gives it. She replies, "because it is a Jewish camp and we have had problems before."

Acrosport's explanation is also not good enough for B'nai Brith Canada, which says Acrosport's refusal to take bookings from Jewish camps is "a serious violation of human rights" and it should apologize.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which initially felt the company might be violating the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, now accepts Acrosport's explanation.

"The owner assured us the centre is open to the Jewish community, and we consider the matter closed," said CIJA spokesperson Eta Yuding.

On May 16, François Leblanc, who identified himself as the son of the owner of the club, told The CJN that as a private enterprise, it can choose with whom it does business.

He did not specify which Jewish camps have not paid their bills or that do not respect the safety regulations. He also alluded to certain "accommodations" sought on religious grounds.

Rabbi Raskin told The CJN that he has been bringing campers to Acrosport for at least five or six years, without any incident, and denied that his camp, which serves about 80 kids, did not pay on time. "We have no choice but to pay. They demand payment in full 30 days after the reservation," he said.

However, Rabbi Raskin said he has had the sense that "they don't like us... We do feel they always had a problem with us."

As for the campers' behaviour, he said Ohr Menachem counsellors are not allowed to accompany them into the trampoline area. Acrosport staff are completely in charge of the site.

"Still, we watch from the side, and we have heard the staff using foul language with the children," said Rabbi Raskin, who said he has had no direct contact with Acrosport since May 15.

He notes that trampolining is an exuberant activity, and it's natural for kids to get a little "wild."

In the interview with The CJN, Leblanc cited language as a possible aggravating factor in this incident, because the woman who took Rabbi Raskin's call is francophone. He said it is "unfortunate" that she was "misunderstood" because of her lack of ease in English, but no apology is in order.

Even if Acrosport apologized, Rabbi Raskin said it's unlikely the camp would return there. "An apology is a minimum, but it resolves nothing. It does not change what is in their hearts," he said. ■

Vandals damage cemetery headstones in Winnipeg

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Some time between May 9 and 11, vandals entered the Hebrew Sick Benefit Cemetery in north Winnipeg and knocked as many as 25 headstones off their bases.

Jonathan Buchwald, executive director of Congregation Etz Chayim, which operates the cemetery, said the damage was restricted to the first two sections of the walled-in old part of the 100-year-old graveyard. "It's lucky that there wasn't much real damage," Buchwald said.

Although the estimated cost to restore the headstones to their bases could be as high as $60,000, Buchwald said it won't be too difficult a task, and none of the stones were damaged.

Buchwald said police are investigating, but that there don't seem to be any anti-Semitic overtones to the attack.

"There is no graffiti anywhere or Nazi symbols anywhere," he said. "Most likely it was just kids fooling around. We don't know how they managed to knock over the headstones without damaging any of them."

He added the synagogue is in the process of contacting the families whose relatives' headstones were affected.

The same cemetery was also vandalized in August 1999, with considerably more damage inflicted on that occasion.

More than 300 headstones were overturned and dozens damaged beyond repair.

Five young adults were eventually arrested for that attack. They were given conditional sentences and ordered to pay restitution. One of the culprits had Jewish family members. ■

Holocaust remembrance in Ottawa

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

A poignant, unspoken reminder of the passage of time and the urgency of hearing first-hand accounts from Holocaust survivors was evident at the very opening of this year's National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony.

The March on the Colours by Ottawa's Jewish War Veterans, which opened the May 15 ceremony, was a procession of only three veterans.

The message from Thomas Hecht, a longtime and well-known community activist and volunteer, was a very personal illustration of the 2014 theme: Jews "on the edge" 1944: Between Annihilation and Liberation.

Students from Montreal and Toronto took part in the ceremony and they, together with students from Ottawa – both the Ottawa Jewish Community School and a local public school – presented a declaration vowing to carry on the memory of the Holocaust into the next generation.

The ceremony, held at the National War Museum, was attended by Holocaust survivors and their families, many of whom travelled from Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere, as well as by church groups, community members, politicians and diplomats, including Israel's ambassador to Canada, Rafael Barak. ■

Important to plan financially for special needs child

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rick Strutt with his son, Tyler

When thinking about what it takes to care for a child with special needs, you might expect that it requires a lot of love, patience and moral support.

In many cases, it can also be a major financial commitment that requires a lot of planning for the future, said Rick Strutt, a financial advisor and retirement specialist for CIBC, and a father of a child with special needs.

Strutt's 18-year-old son, Tyler, who is globally developmentally delayed and non-verbal, needs help with all his activities and his daily living, and will require financial support for his entire life, he said.

Strutt volunteers with Community Living Toronto, a social service agency that advocates for people with intellectual disabilities, and he lectures at the Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital on the subject of financial planning for families with special needs children

He spoke last week at the Current Trends in Paediatric Neuro-Developmental Disabilities conference, held at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan, Ont., outlining some of the things parents can do to provide their children with financial security for years to come.

He told The CJN that when parents come to meet him seeking financial advice for their special needs children, they often talk about present-day issues, like the cost of therapy and access to government funding, but they also worry about how to plan for their child's future.

"You need to understand your present financial situation. Build a plan," Strutt said.

"Sometimes when I do seminars, people's eyes look like deer in headlights because it's about understanding the supports and services [available] when they're children. Then they transition out when they're 18 or 19. What are they going to do? What are they going to do after school [post-21] if they don't have the ability to work? And then, how will they provide for them financially? Where will they live?"

Strutt said he struggled with the same concerns when his son was growing up.

"What's going to happen to him when I'm not around?... As a parent, that is my main concern. I'm not concerned with now. He's a great kid, he's enhanced our lives in so many different ways, he's a hoot to be around, but it's like, what happens to him when we're not around? That is a big concern."

Based on his experience, most parents are intimidated by the process.

"I tell them to just start with where they are today, where they're going and chunk off things a little bit at a time," he said.

He said it's important for people to learn about their employment benefits, and their long-term disability plans.

"Then you have to build a team. Find a lawyer that understands it. If you're doing a will, find a lawyer that does wills for families that have children with special needs, who is familiar with the Henson Trust," he said.

The Henson Trust, a discretionary trust that protects the assets and inheritance of people with special needs without interfering with their right to collect government benefits, can be set up at any time, with the help of a good estate or trust lawyer, Strutt said.

"I can't give [Tyler] the money, so what I do is, I say, fine, I'm going to put it into a trust and the trustee... [will] pay out certain expenses for Tyler over the course of his life," he explained.

"I don't want to leave money directly to Tyler because he's not going to be able to manage it. You want to make sure that if you're going to set up a trust for him, set it up, ensure that you have proper people [taking care of it] and understand what you're trying to do, what the picture looks like."

When it comes to government benefits, Strutt said the most significant one available in Ontario is the Ontario Disability Support Program (ODSP), which children become eligible for when they turn 18.

"But that has limits on income and assets, so you want to be aware of the rules," Strutt said.

"Tyler's got a bank account, but for ODSP purposes, they don't want him to have more than $5,000 in his bank account, because that could affect what he gets [from the government]... Realizing that the maximum they can get from ODSP is about $1,200 a month, you're protecting their poverty income for them."

The Registered Disability Savings Plan (RDSP), which Strutt described as "an RSP for individuals who can't really support themselves," is another savings plan parents should consider.

When it comes to estate planning and drafting wills, Strutt suggests that making it as current as possible is the best approach.

"A lot of people want to set up a will that is good for the rest of their lives. But who you associate with and who you want to have as guardians for your children when you're 30 may be different when you're 50, right?"

Strutt added that a good financial plan shouldn't be static, and should be revisited annually.

"Have there been any material changes? Have you had another child? If you've got [a plan] started, you're not reinventing the whole wheel, you're just kind of trimming it down," he said.

"Building a good team is really important also. Network with other parents. What other people do may not work for you but there may be portions of it that work."

He said the biggest mistake parents make is being paralyzed by the thought of tackling these issues.

"We're all busy. Sometimes we just look at our feet. Sometimes we don't look at the big picture for things, and there's a lot there for families with children with special needs, but really, the onus is on us to really put it together."■

People need to be tolerant

EVE SMAGALA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I love kids. They're so cute and I love playing with them. That's why working with kids is the perfect job for me.

I spent 14 years working at Camp Robin Hood and loved taking the kids to activities and helping them at lunchtime. Now I work five half-days a week as a teachers' assistant at Holy Blossom Temple's preschool. I also volunteer a few afternoons a week at the Columbus Centre's daycare. All of the kids are under four years old. They adore me. They're always running to me and hugging me.

Working with very young children is great for me because their behaviour is easy for me to understand. You see, I have Asperger syndrome, which is on the autism spectrum, but I am quite high-functioning.

I'm 31 years old and live in my own apartment with my roommate, Sarah, and my cat, Lucky. I take care of my place really well, and Sarah and I share the cooking.

I take the bus to work, and usually buy groceries on the way home. I go to most of my appointments on my own. I've been practising karate for more than 10 years and have my brown advanced belt. I've been skiing since I was a kid. Last year, I took up snowboarding and I really enjoy it. I like to relax, talk on the phone and go to movies with my friends.

> The more cues I can recognize, the better I am at doing what's needed. I feel good about that, too

Still, what I do need help with are things like balancing my life, paying my bills and doing my taxes.

I am especially good at remembering things and problem-solving – when I'm not upset. I've been told that I have difficulties with visual patterns, which makes it hard for me to read or to recognize people's body language. That sometimes makes me anxious, and when this happens, I have trouble thinking clearly, problem-solving or changing my routine.

I don't usually talk much, but when I'm anxious I get too talkative and I don't realize I should stop. When I am misunderstood, I get upset easily. There have been times when I've been told to shut up, and it really hurts.

I often had trouble at school or in interviews, and I still sometimes have trouble meeting new people, because when I respond inappropriately they think I have a poor attitude or that I'm lazy. I'm better with precise instructions. For example, when I supervise the children on playground equipment, it's helpful for my supervisor to tell me that only one child is allowed on the slide at a time. Then I know exactly what to do. But if I'm just told to "watch the children," I might let too many kids play on it, and it could become dangerous.

Fortunately, I have learned some strategies to help me succeed at work. My supervisors give me specific cues for the tasks I have trouble initiating, like a timer that vibrates when it's snack time so that I can start preparing it for the kids, or hand signals that cue me to stop talking and start listening.

I really appreciate how helpful my co-workers have been. Nobody else realizes that I'm getting cues, and that makes me feel good. It helps me to feel confident that I can do the job, instead of scared that I am misunderstanding stuff. The more cues I can recognize, the better I am at doing what's needed. I feel good about that, too.

If I could tell society one thing, it would be this: try to be more sensitive, more patient, more tolerant, more understanding. There are a lot of different kinds of people in this world. Some might be quicker or more capable than others, but everyone has something valuable to offer. Just like me. ■

COR responds to CJN Behind the Label series

Our fees go to provide services for community

Richard Rabkin

We appreciate this opportunity to respond to issues raised by The Canadian Jewish News about our organization. The Kashruth Council of Canada, commonly known as COR, provides a critical service to the community, and we welcome the chance to provide more information about our operations.

COR is a not-for-profit organization and all fees collected go towards covering our operations and growing our services to the community.

Marvin Sigler, chairman of Gold Seal Management and past COR chairman explained: "In food service (i.e. restaurants and caterers), we operate at a financial deficit – our expenses are greater than our fees. We are able to marginally compensate for this loss from our other divisions. We have not increased our food service fees in the last three years, and in some cases we subsidize certain community institutions."

We surveyed a number of restaurants and found that of their total expenses, COR fees represent approximately one per cent. "My COR fees represent less than half a per cent of my total costs," Yoram Gabay, owner of Dr. Laffa, said. "Anyone who thinks COR is responsible for the cost of kosher food doesn't know what he's talking about."

COR is extremely sensitive to the cost of kosher food. For example, this is the driving reason why we have been advocating so aggressively for an alternate kosher chicken processor in Canada.

As opposed to what was reported in The CJN, COR charges our caterers a standard $31 per hour for event mashgichim, which is in line with other kosher certifiers.

When we told our proprietors that we were making a video to let people hear from them directly, all who were already coming into our office to sell their chametz on the day of the shooting, participated. All 11 participants said that their COR fees were reasonable and their working relationship with COR is strong. Watch the video at www.TheTruthAboutCOR.com.

Customers choose COR because they know that we are reliable, professional, we have high standards, and our prices are modest in comparison with other major kosher certifiers. When COR certifies something as kosher, you can rely on that fact.

COR's entire operations are supervised by lay and rabbinic boards ensuring transparency and accountability. The rabbinic board is made up of 22 respected community rabbis. Lay representatives are appointed by local synagogues and include business professionals who ensure that our organization is being run in the community's best interests.

"COR's financial statements are audited annually by Grunwald and Co., an independent accounting firm and the financial data is available to the public on Canada Revenue Agency's website," said longtime COR treasurer Ronald Rutman, partner at accounting firm Zeifmans LLP. "Senior staff salaries are set by the executive board's lay volunteers and all financial operations are transparent and in full compliance with governmental regulations."

COR began and operated for many years affiliated with Canadian Jewish Congress then UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. When COR separated from federation, the accumulated surplus that COR had generated to that point was transferred to COR for start-up costs. Although COR was an incorporated not-for-profit entity at the time, it was not yet a registered charity, so there was no means to pass the funds to COR. Therefore, in accordance with CRA rules a new registered charity (the "Matan Fund") was created to facilitate the transfer of these funds.

The CJN noted our financial reporting seemed to show a drop in number of employees. Jack Feintuch, president at Runnymede Development and COR's vice-chair explained: "In 2013, CRA recorded our employees differently than had been done previously. There was no change in the actual number of employees." In fact, we have approximately 150 employees consisting of expert mashgichim who supervise our approximately 1,000 facilities in Canada and around the world, and our professional office staff who administer their work.

COR is not afraid of competition. As an active member of the Association of Kashrus Organizations (AKO), we work closely with our competitors in the kosher industry. Indeed, Rabbi Moshe Elefant, the chief operating officer at OU Kosher, remarked, "I have worked with COR closely for many years. I have found them to be highly professional and experts in the field of kosher supervision. In my opinion, kosher consumers in Toronto and Canada at large are fortunate to have an upstanding organization like COR serving them."

Ira Marder, COR's current chairman, explained, "COR is available as a free consumer resource for anything kosher: from koshering people's homes to answering kosher questions. This Passover alone, COR answered over 3,000 consumer questions. We appreciate the confidence that has been placed in us by the Jewish community and are honoured to serve you."

Everyone who works or volunteers for COR does so because we care about our community, and we are passionate about the belief that people should have access to kosher food. Every day we strive to serve you better, and if you have suggestions for how we can improve, we want to hear from you. Email us at info@cor.ca. ■

Ottawa art exhibit slammed for glorifying terrorism

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Canada's Israeli embassy and Ottawa's Jewish Federation say that an art exhibit on display at Ottawa City Hall's Karsh-Masson Art Gallery glorifies Palestinian terrorism and have urged the city to review its policy on how exhibits are approved.

The exhibit, Invisible by Palestinian-born, Toronto-based artist Rehab Nazzal, includes photographs of some of the most notorious Palestinian terrorists, including Abu Iyad, who was responsible for the 1972 Munich Games massacre, and Khalid Nazzal, the artist's brother-in-law, who was the mastermind behind the Ma'alot school massacre that killed 22 children and three adults 40 years ago.

Eitan Weiss, spokesperson and head of public diplomacy for the Israeli Embassy in Canada, said the embassy was moved to contact Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson when it learned that the city was "endorsing it, and not only that, but paying for it. They are funding a lot of this with taxpayers' money."

Artists are paid about $1,800 to have their work displayed at the gallery.

> It's a hurtful exhibit in the fact that it glorifies Palestinian terrorists, so it's highly problematic that it is funded by taxpayers' dollars and it has no place in City Hall.
> Eitan Weiss
> Israel Embassy

"The artist is portraying these people as innocent Palestinians, authors, writers, cartoonists, politicians who were assassinated by Israel," Weiss said. "We're talking about terrorists with blood on their hands."

Jewish Federation of Ottawa president and CEO Andrea Freedman said "it's a hurtful exhibit in the fact that it glorifies Palestinian terrorists, so it's highly problematic that it is funded by taxpayers' dollars and it has no place in City Hall."

She said federation has called on the city to shut down the exhibit, which is scheduled to run until June 22.

In an email statement to The CJN, deputy city manager Steve Kanellakos explained that the exhibit is in line with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that it won't be taken down prematurely.

All exhibits at the gallery are selected by an independent jury and the themes of each exhibit do not represent the views of the City of Ottawa, he said.

"To exhibit a work of art is not to endorse the work or the vision, ideas, and opinions of the artist. It is to uphold the right of all to experience diverse visions and views."

However, following meetings with the federation and Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak, the mayor agreed to review the policy governing the selection process of the gallery's artwork, which has been in place since 1993.

Nazzal, who will speak on Ottawa City Hall property on June 1 about her exhibit, told the Ottawa Citizen last week that the decision by the city to review the policy has her "concerned about the future of artists showing work of significance."

Although Freedman said she's disappointed the exhibit remains open, "the main thing from our perspective is that the city... will be reviewing and revising their policies so that in the future, no other community will have to experience this."

Weiss said the purpose of the meeting between the ambassador and the mayor was not to shut down the exhibit.

"We understand their constraints, because at the end of the day, they are aware of the fact that this is a problematic exhibition, and they claim that their hands are tied due to legal constraints in terms of taking it down," he said.

"We're just trying to expose reality and expose the truth and use this moment as a teaching moment and tell the Canadian audience that if you want to know why Israelis and Palestinians haven't reached a peace agreement, this is the reason why. Palestinians enshrine terrorists, they commemorate and glorify them, and this is something that is unacceptable. Imagine what people would have said if the pictures of the 9/11 terrorists would have been there," Weiss said.

"It's a good opportunity for us to showcase the Palestinian propaganda and how they tend to twist the reality and change the truth to suit their narrative, which is completely false in this case. This is our objective in this." ■

Belgian Jews not surprised by museum attack

CNAAN LIPHSHIZ
JTA

The cold determination with which the shooter at Belgium's Jewish museum murdered four people shocked many Belgians, but local Jewish leaders have long anticipated the possibility of such an attack on their community.

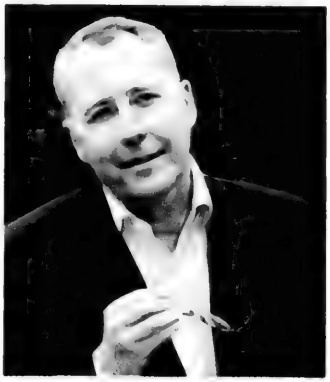
The shooter who entered the Jewish Museum of Belgium on May 24 in central Brussels "approached each victim with calm, aiming only for the head without uttering a word in manner that is shocking because of the level of training it suggests," said Mischael Modrikamen, the Jewish leader of Belgium's small, centrist Parti Populaire.

"Sadly, however, the actual attack comes as no surprise to us after years of living in an atmosphere of rampant anti-Semitism that often leads to violence," he added.

Within hours of the attack, the local Jewish community and the European Jewish Congress' Brussels-based Security and Crisis Centre were operating a crisis management room complete with a telephone hotline and – a testament to years of preparations for a terrorist attack on one of Europe's most at-risk communities.

The shooter, who fled the scene along with a driver, used what appeared to be an AK-47 to kill Israeli tourists Mira and Emanuel Riva and two of the museum's staff, a man in his 20s and a female volunteer, Belgian authorities said.

A manhunt is underway to capture the perpetrators of the deadliest anti-Semitic attack in Europe since the French Islamist Mohammed Merah killed four people at a Jewish school in Toulouse in 2012.



Mischael Modrikamen WIKIMEDIA COMMONS

Indeed, the characteristics of the Brussels museum attack follow the pattern observed at Toulouse, according to Claude Moniquet, a Brussels-based counter-terrorism expert.

"It seems we are dealing with a small cell of operatives – Islamists or otherwise – with a low signature that minimizes their risk of being caught," he said.

Yet Belgium's Jews have experience with such violence that predates the Toulouse attack by more than 20 years. In 1989, a Moroccan terrorist assassinated the community's then president, Joseph Wybran.

OPINION

Seeking answers in the Jewish Diaspora

Natalie Birnbaum

How do you identify yourself? As an American living abroad in Israel, I constantly identify myself according to my nationality. The idea of nationality as the cornerstone of our individual identities is neither a novel idea, nor one ingrained in human nature. The State of Israel can be seen as the fulfilment of the modern Zionist dream of a national Jewish state. However, in this day and age, does an Israeli nationality provide its people with a sufficient sense of identity?

The concept of modern-day nationalism did not even emerge until the 18th century. German philosopher Johann Gottfried Herder coined the term nationalism as we know it today. Herder, who idealized ethnic nationalism, envisioned a world where nations are defined by a shared heritage, "wonderfully separated… not only by woods and mountains, seas and deserts, rivers and climates, but more particularly by languages, inclinations and characters." Once this ideology began to infiltrate and reframe European society, a cultural revolution began to take shape.

What did this new nationalism mean for those who didn't fit the national moulds, who didn't share the common "languages, inclinations and characters" of the land? What did this mean for 18th- and 19th-century European Jewry?

As Reut Institute founder Gidi Grinstein writes in his book Flexigidity, "the wave of nationalism and national movements in Europe motivated a handful of Jewish leaders to reframe their understanding of Judaism and to reawaken the ancient story of Jewish nationhood, largely suppressed since the Bar Kochba rebellion." Ultimately, this wave of European nationalism and ethnic identity magnified Jews' desire for a national home of their own, thus paving the way for modern Zionism and the State of Israel.

Now in its 66th year, the State of Israel thrives. But while its nationalism remains intact, does it also live in the souls of its inhabitants? When an Israeli is asked to identify himself, is it about his nationality that he most proudly boasts?

While Israelis express unquestionable pride in their country, they also yearn to take part in the cultural trends and customs of greater western society. It seems that a solely Israeli identity may not be enough, that Israelis seek other forms of identification, figuratively in the form of culture, but and also literally in the form of passports. In fact, in the past 10 to 15 years, there has been a remarkable upsurge in foreign passport applications from Israelis.

The high number of Israelis seeking foreign passports may simply reflect a desire to ease travel or work abroad, or provide an "exit strategy" in case of terror, but I find this desire for dual nationality to be a bit more profound.

Today's born-and-raised Israelis are more removed from their Diaspora roots than ever before. As time passes, Israel's younger generations are being born into families of parents and grandparents who are all native to the state.

Paradoxically, as these familial ties become more deeply rooted in Israel and our biblical homeland, the passing of time also creates distance from our history in the European Diaspora. The notion of the "wandering Jew" is ingrained in our Jewish cultural mindset and may not be shaken so easily.

The passport craze can be understood as a physical manifestation of the amorphous Jewish soul and our traditional longing to understand our shared history. For thousands of years, the Jewish People sought to return to our homeland, to end our wandering and rediscover our roots. Israel was our answer. Today, however, our Jewish history extends beyond biblical text, to hundreds of years spent in the European Diaspora. Perhaps the youngest generations of Israelis cannot solely look toward Jerusalem the way their ancestors did for questions about heritage. Perhaps there's a new wave of Jewish questioning that can only be answered in the Diaspora. ■

Pope visits Western Wall, Yad Vashem

JTA

Pope Francis visited an array of religious sites and national memorials on his final day in Israel.

His itinerary included visits to the Western Wall and Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial, where he gave a speech condemning anti-Semitism and hatred. He also met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres.

The Pope began his day with a visit to the Temple Mount and the Dome of the Rock, where he met with the Grand Mufti Muhammad Ahmad Hussein of Jerusalem, the highest Muslim religious authority there.

He then went to the adjacent Western Wall, Judaism's holiest site, where he prayed and left a note. He also met with Western Wall Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz.

The Pope also visited the grave of Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, and made an unplanned stop at a memorial for victims of terror. The visits come a day after the Pope referred to the "state of Palestine" in a speech in Bethlehem and stopped to pray at Israel's security barrier there. Those gestures were widely seen as endorsements of Palestinian national aspirations.

At Yad Vashem, the Pope met with Holocaust survivors, laid a wreath and said, "Never again, Lord, never again."

Later in a speech, he said, "A great evil has befallen us, as such that has never occurred. Grant us the grace to be ashamed of what men have done, to be ashamed of this massive idolatry."

Pope Francis also met with Israel's chief rabbis, David Lau and Yitzhak Yosef, as well as a group of sick Christian Arab-Israelis, before travelling to Peres' official residence.

He arrived in the region May 24, which he spent in Amman, Jordan. He went the next morning to Bethlehem, where he visited the Church of the Nativity – the traditional site of Jesus' birth – and gave a speech alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

The Pope arrived in Israel May 25 in the afternoon, where he gave a speech at Ben-Gurion Airport before meeting with his Eastern Orthodox counterpart, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The two leaders signed a joint declaration and called for greater Christian unity.

"I greet all the people of Israel with prayerful good wishes that their aspirations of peace and prosperity will achieve fulfilment," Pope Francis said in his speech at the airport. "We all know how urgent is the need for peace, not only for Israel but also for the entire region. May efforts and energies be increasingly directed to the pursuit of a just and lasting solution to the conflicts which have caused so much suffering."

Pope Frances was greeted at Ben-Gurion by Netanyahu and Peres, accompanied by a band playing Jerusalem of Gold.

"You have arrived in the State of Israel where today members of different religions and nationalities live together – Jews, Christians, Muslims, Druse and Circassians," said Peres in an address upon the Pope's arrival. "Israel is a Jewish and democratic state where coexistence in peace is implemented, and a state that aspires for peace with all its neighbours. Even if peace calls for sacrifices, the sacrifices of peace are preferable to the threat of war."

In Bethlehem, the Pope called for an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and referred to the "state of Palestine." He also called for peace in a speech upon arriving in Israel.

"All of us must become the builders and constructors of this peace," he says. "All men and women of this land, and the world at large, are asking us to work towards peace."

He also invited Peres and Abbas to the Vatican next month for a prayer summit for peace. Peres and Abbas have accepted the invitation, according to reports, despite Israel's suspension of negotiations with the Palestinian Authority last month. ■

Five wounded in attack on Brussels shul in 1982

An armed attack on Brussels' largest synagogue – located some 350 metres from the museum – left five wounded in 1982, three years after 13 people were wounded in a grenade attack on an El Al plane at Brussels' airport.

Some of the worst attacks on Belgian Jewry happened between 1979 and 1981, when Arab terrorists killed four people in a series of explosions, including a car bomb, and shootings directed at Jewish targets in Antwerp's Diamond Quarter.

"That track record means that no one thought this couldn't happen here," said Joel Rubinfeld, president of the Belgian League Against Anti-Semitism and former leader of French-speaking Belgian Jews. "In fact, most of us knew it could and would, especially in recent years. So I am shocked, but not in the least surprised."

The level of threat increased after the second Palestinian intifadah, when Belgium began seeing dozens of anti-Semitic attack each year for the first time since World War II.

Recent years saw another development not only because of Merah – who inspired a slew of anti-Semitic attacks across the French-speaking world – but because "of the arrival to the scene of new patrons of anti-Semitism in the French-speaking world," Rubinfeld said, a reference to Dieudonné M'bala M'bala, a French comedian whose blatant anti-Semitism has emboldened anti-Semites.

Earlier this month, Belgian authorities banned a conference organized in Brussels by several individuals with a track-record of promoting anti-Semitism, including Dieudonné, French activist Alain Soral and Belgian lawmaker Laurent Louis.

Rubinfeld said that Belgian authorities have generally had "a more lax attitude" toward anti-Semitism than their French counterparts. The banning of the conference earlier this month "was the first case of its kind in recent years where we saw a determined stance," he added.

Modrikamen noted that police maintained no permanent presence outside the Jewish Museum of Belgium. "Even when police do place protection, it means two cops in a car parked outside a building and nothing comparable to the security provided in France," he said.

But Arie Zuckerman, a European Jewish Congress executive who has spearheaded Jewish communities' preparations for crises after Toulouse, says the problem isn't local.

"When governments perceive a threat, they know how to co-operate tightly and devote enormous resources and we see this in the war on drugs, for example," he said. "Sadly, no such pan-European recognition has emerged on the need to protect Jewish institutions, which often have to carry the burden of security costs. We saw it Brussels, where the terrorists probably collected intelligence without being detected, but it could happen in many other places. The tragedy is in Belgium, but the problem is in Europe."

In an unrelated attack in France the next day, on May 25, two French Jewish men were attacked while on their way to synagogue. The men, brothers aged 18 and 21 from the Paris suburb of Creteil, were attacked from behind by two men on bicycles, according to a statement from the French Jewish organization SPCJ.

The attackers, men in their twenties, wore brass knuckles and hit the brothers in the face. The attackers fled after the brothers defended themselves.

A passing car stopped to pick the men up and drove them to the hospital. According to SPCJ, the men's faces are "heavily injured," and will need surgery, but they are expected to recover. ■

Gerontology expert raises profile of Israeli college

plungen@thecjn.ca

Set in the midst of verdant green farmland, with the hills of the Galilee in the background, the Max Stern Yezreel Valley College attracts young adults primarily from the surrounding area.

Moshav Tel Adashim is nearby and practically across the street – actually it's Highway 60 – is Kibbutz Mizra.

Not exactly household names, unless you live nearby, but the Yezreel Valley College can perhaps better be described by reference to better known locales. It is situated on the highway between Nazareth, to the north, and Afula, to the south.

If you haven't yet heard about the Yezreel Valley College, well, Ariela Lowenstein would like to change that. Lowenstein is president of the college and she was in Toronto last week to meet a supporter of the school as well as a potential benefactor.

Raising the profile of the school in Canada was the primary reason for her visit, but as a grandparent, social worker and professor emeritus of Haifa University, she was also interested in attending an event at the University of Toronto's Institute for Life Course and Aging.

The issue is near and dear to her heart and is one area of instruction she hopes to expand at the college, she said.

The school has 14 departments and confers two postgraduate degrees. Its nursing program is in great demand and it also offers instruction in communications, health systems managements, economics and management, and information systems management. It offers MA degrees in organizational development and consulting and in educational counselling.

Close to 5,000 students attend the college and another 1,000 are engaged in preparatory programs to get them ready for the demands of higher education.

"It has been a regional college under the auspices of Haifa University," Lowenstein said in explaining the school's origins. "About 17 years ago it became an independent college."

It is one of 20 publicly funded colleges in Israel, six of which are in the Galilee. The Yezreel Valley College was located where it is to be more accessible to the local population, though it does draw students from as far away as Haifa.

Yezreel Valley College serves the many one-time "development towns" that date back to the origins of the State of Israel. In addition, the area is home to a substantial Arab population, who take advantage of the school's educational programs. About 23 per cent of the student body is Arab, reflecting pretty closely the country's demographics, Lowenstein said.

Arab students seem to prefer health-related professions, and about 50 per cent of the school's nursing school are Arabs. The school also has students from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union. Many of the Ethiopian students also study nursing, she said.

About 400 students live in nearby residences in Afula and commute daily to the campus. "It's a very happy campus," Lowenstein said. "We believe in multiculturalism. Good personal relations exist between students."

Her personal interest is in gerontology – a field of growing interest in Israel. The country is third in the world in average lifespans "due to our health system and very developed services for the elderly."

"Elders are resilient because of what we experience in Israel," she said. "They have to cope."

Israeli culture places great emphasis on family life. "The elders are very involved with their families" and vice versa, she said.

This impacts on quality of life in a positive way and, at 24 per cent, the elderly are not institutionalized to nearly the extent as in other advanced countries, she said.

They spend more time with their families "and that makes life more interesting, fulfilling and extends life expectancy," she said.

But there are stresses on the family, particularly as women increasingly join the work force. It is an area ripe for study and Lowenstein hopes to establish a chair in aging and intergenerational family relations – if she can raise the funds.

Perhaps another trip to Canada is in the offing. ■

RIGHTEOUS REUNION: A SURVIVOR REUNITES WITH HIS RESCUER

THE STORY OF TWO LIVES FOREVER CONNECTED

Witness this gripping documentary on Canadian Holocaust Survivor, Sidney Zoltak, as he returns to his childhood town of Siemiatycze, Poland. CBC documents his reunion with the heroic Krinsky family, who provided underground shelter to Sidney and his family for 14 months. The film revisits the hiding place that spared their lives from the Nazis.

From there Sidney joins the March of the Living with over 10,000 young people from around the world, including 800 Canadian students, survivors, and chaperones, for an emotional journey through Warsaw, Krakow and Lublin – once bustling centres of Jewish life and culture. They also visit sites of the Holocaust including the death camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau, where Sidney's family was imprisoned and Treblinka, where almost all of Sidney's entire town was murdered. On Holocaust Remembrance Day, Sidney accompanied students on a defiant march from Auschwitz-Birkenau – the largest killing field in the history of humanity – in memory of all victims of Nazi genocide and against prejudice, intolerance and hate.

Jews are in Lisbon's, and Portugal's, DNA

A plaque in Lisbon commemorates the 1506 massacre of thousands of Jews. RON CSILLAG PHOTO

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As in so many European capitals, the Jewish experience in Lisbon mirrors the wider one. Portugal, once a powerhouse that controlled a good chunk of the world through a mighty military and brisk trade, is today mired in debt, thanks to heavy borrowing needed to save the country from red ink (though it is stressed repeatedly that the country is recovering and nowhere near as poor as Greece).

Once home to a thriving Jewish community whose members were seconded to the royal court to serve in a variety of professions, Portugal now has just 700 affiliated Jews, though that number could be as much as 6,000 and even higher if certain genetic traits are factored in (more on that later).

Lisbon's Jewish history is fascinating, violent and passionate – with all those aspects brought into sharp focus by our guide, Paolo Scheffer, a U.S.-educated art historian whose enthusiasm is infectious and depth of knowledge amazing. He speaks quickly and wastes no words, so pay attention.

We begin in the Praça do Comércio (Commerce Square), a large central plaza that abuts the harbour and is ringed by official-looking buildings. It was here that ships from around the world docked with their exotic cargoes of spices, fabrics and gold.

One of the first things to get out of the way is the word "Marrano," sometimes used to describe Iberian Jews who were forced to convert to Christianity during the Inquisition. It's pejorative, Scheffer stressed, and means "pig." Noted.

Better, in the case of Portugal, to use the term "Cristão Novo," or "New Christian." Why?

"Because in Spain, it was 'convert or leave,'" explains Scheffer, whose mother's family descended from so-called crypto-Jews. "In Portugal, it was 'convert or die.' There was no expulsion."

Judaism was outlawed in 1498, when Jews comprised as much as a quarter of the whole population, including many Spanish Jews who had arrived under the Edict of Expulsion six years earlier (the faith was not formally legalized until 1822). Very few Jews opted to die but many thousands did flee to places such as Amsterdam, Brazil and the Caribbean, leaving behind all property and, in many cases, even their children, who were left with the church to be raised as Christians (and leaving the king desperate for professionals).

Our next stop is St. Dominic's church, its blackened interior a vestige of Inquisition processions that began and ended with charred corpses. It was here that in April 1506, a New Christian muttered something sarcastic about a religious relic and was pummelled to death. Spurred by fanatical Dominican monks, the result was a frenzy of blood that overlapped with Passover. The eight-day pogrom killed an unknown number of converted Jews. "It was 4,000 in the first three days," Scheffer said. "After that, they stopped counting."

Outside in Rossio Square, a Star of David-shaped plaque, unveiled on the 500th anniversary of the massacre, pays tribute to the "Jewish victims of intolerance and religious fanaticism." Also in 2006, the Church apologized and asked for forgiveness.

The Inquisition in Portugal was formally established in 1536. Last summer, Portugal's parliament passed a law granting automatic nationality to descendants of the estimated 400,000 Jews killed, forced to convert or who fled during those dark days.

Sliding effortlessly into the World War II era, Scheffer dismissed suggestions that Portugal had been neutral. "Officially only," he scoffed. The country, he said, did big business with Nazi Germany, supplying the Third Reich with precious tungsten and being paid in 129 tonnes of untraceable gold. The country never fully addressed the issue. "Portugal still holds Nazi gold," Scheffer said pointedly.

But Portugal produced two Righteous Among the Nations, the better known being Aristides de Sousa Mendes, who served as the country's war-time consul-general in Bordeaux, France, and defied orders by issuing 30,000 protective visas to refugees fleeing Germany. As many as 20,000 were given to Jews. Punished by his fascist government and relieved of his duties, he died in poverty in 1954.

Scheffer noted that there is no public monument in the country to Mendes (if you don't count a small metal medallion dedicated to him in the Parque Metro station, which, Scheffer noted, is about the diameter of grapefruit). For that matter, Lisbon has no Jewish museum, though Scheffer operates a virtual one, at mpjh.org.

There are three synagogues in the country. The Kadoorie Mekor Haim in Porto bills itself as the largest shul in the Iberian peninsula. There's a 200-member Sephardi congregation in Belmonte, and for the 300 declared Jews of Lisbon, there's Sinagoga Shaaré Tikvá, which requires notice before visits by foreigners. Scheffer credits Chabad with uniting the community.

Try to get to Lisbon's Alfama quarter, where a large Jewish community flourished in the Middle Ages. Known as the Judiaria Grande, its labyrinth of narrow cobblestone streets included the Rua da Judiaria. One local church was built atop a synagogue. At the Carmo church in the Chiado quarter, routine digging a few years unearthed several centuries-old Jewish tombstones now on display.

The tales gush from Scheffer about famous Jewish doctors, merchants, navigators and masons. The country's Islamic flavour, still redolent from 500 years of Moorish rule, is clearly spiced with a Jewish one. While Jewish numbers could be as high as 6,000, he cited modern studies showing that up to 20 per cent of all Portuguese – or two million people – have Jewish genetic markers. Between that finding and the food, music and myriad Jewish contributions to society, Judaism "is in our DNA," he said. ■

Raising awareness, one scarf at a time

RITA POLIAKOV
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When fashion designer Laura Siegel first heard about last year's Rana Plaza garment factory collapse in Bangladesh, she was upset. But not shocked.

"I've never worked in Bangladesh, but I spent a lot of time in India," she said. "To be honest, I wasn't so surprised that something like that could happen, mainly because I've witnessed first hand what some of the factory conditions can be like."

As a designer based in Toronto and New York, Siegel likes to research factories before beginning a line of clothing. She works with artisans internationally and has toured factories in both China and India.

And she wasn't always impressed with what she saw.

"It's OK to walk into a building where there are no signs and it's dirty. To be honest with you, that's something that isn't so bad," she said. "But when you walk into an environment where there's X amount of sewing machines per square footage and X amount of people per square footage... it's just work, make mistakes, get yelled at – those are the worst scenarios I've witnessed."

Which is why Siegel, 26, decided to act.

"I was talking with my parents about what we could do, what do you do after something like this? Because you can't just do nothing," she said of the collapse, which killed 1,127 workers.

"We decided it'd be a good idea to do something that would raise awareness, that would get people thinking about who made [their clothes] and what their lives are like."

Eventually, project Eleven27 was born. Siegel decided to work with local artisans in India who would hand-weave 1,127 scarves – made from reused saris – to honour each person who died in the tragedy.

"We wanted to do something in honour of individuals who lost their lives. What happened was a very big wake-up call," she said.

Proceeds from the sale of the scarves will go directly to the affected families in Savar, Bangladesh. For her initiative, Siegel partnered with Sreepur Village Organization, a group that's working with the victims' children to make sure they're taken care of. The organization is also helping the victims' families manage any money they received after the tragedy by setting up bank accounts.

Eleven27 launched on April 24, exactly a year after the factory – which was constructed illegally – collapsed.

"[Community support] has been unbelievable. So many people came out to the launch," Siegel said, adding that Holt Renfrew supports the campaign and is selling some of the scarves at its stores.

For Siegel, it was important that the scarves were made by Indian artisans in a safe work environment.

"[I wanted] for each scarf to be handmade, for each scarf to have thought that went into it, and whoever was making these scarves, whether it was an individual or a family, that they were able to do so in a nice work environment," she said.

Siegel decided to work with a family in Kutch district in western India.

"The father is a master weaver and the son also weaves. He brought in weavers from the community to hand-make all the scarves and the wife also helps him," she said.

Aside from Holt Renfrew, scarves can be purchased online at laurasiegelcollection.com. ■

Even divas get the blues: Fern Lindzon releases new CD

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like a Circle in a Spiral, the new CD by Juno Award nominee Fern Lindzon, offers an array of standards as well as two original songs, Carrie and Even Divas get the Blues.

Carrie was written about a longtime friend who lived in Massachusetts and died of cancer.

"I saw her a year before she died, and she managed to really hold on for quite a while, but I didn't manage to see her at the end, so the song is a lot about just not being there and that screeching silence," says the jazz singer and piano player.

"She was a big Joni Mitchell fan, so I was thinking of Joni Mitchell when I was writing it."

Even Divas Get the Blues is based on a poem her friend Myna Wallin wrote for Lindzon as a spoken word piece to be performed over music. When it came time to record it, Lindzon reduced the eight-page poem to a three-verse song. She describes it as an abstract telling of a world-weary diva and her encounter with a guy.

The album was produced by bassist George Koller and also features David French on soprano and tenor sax, Michael Davidson on vibes and Nick Fraser on drums. Flutist Bill McBirnie can be heard on the Cole Porter standard, Night and Day and on Shashado/Loro, a scat composition written by Lindzon based on Egberto Gismonti's chord changes (shashado is a northern Brazilian rhythm).

Fern Lindzon

Jazz at the Bookstore was born out of a chance meeting with singer/songwriter Ron Sexsmith aboard a chartered train full of Canadian recording artists on their way to the 2012 Juno Awards in Ottawa from Toronto.

"I told him that I'd love to arrange a piece of his, but not something that everyone else has done. He said that would be great, so I did some research when I got home and listened to his records. Then I found this one and it was so appropriate. I loved the lyrics and the music. I changed the chords a bit to give it a more swing feel."

Like a Circle in a Spiral takes its title from the opening line of Michel Legrand's wonderful song, The Windmills of Your Mind. "Long ago I made the decision that if I was going to record any standards, I had to do it in my own way, because most of those songs have already been recorded by great people.

"So I came up with this arrangement for The Windmills of Your Mind, really thinking about the notions of circles and spirals, just sort of the wheels of life and our crazy thought processes. I set it up so it feels like the melody is floating on top of these wheels that are emotional. I'm a huge fan of Alan and Marilyn Bergman, who wrote the words, which I think are amazing. I'm a big lyric nut, when I hear great lyrics."

The singer says she loves to take standards and rearrange the rhythms and harmonies around the lyrics, which is where most of her arranging ideas come. A prime example comes from her interpretation of Night and Day, which she morphed into what she calls a "jungle salsa."

Also on the CD is Lindzon's rendition of the Hebrew song Mishaela, by Israeli pop star Noa. While working on the arrangement with Koller, he came up with a Southeast Asian-sounding rhythm on the bass. There are also two songs in Yiddish on the album, A Malekh Veynt (An Angel Weeps) and Wishing/Papir Is Dokh Vays (Paper is Still White).

"I am always trying to introduce Yiddish or Hebrew music into a jazz context, because there are a lot of people singing in French and Portuguese, but not a lot of people doing things in Hebrew and Yiddish... it's not world music, it's really jazz." ■

Israeli-born conductor takes TSO reins for Artist's in the Spotlight series

Shalom Bard

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Israeli-born resident conductor with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra takes hold of the baton later this week at Roy Thomson Hall in a program that includes Brahms, Mendelssohn, Liszt and Ravel.

Shalom Bard says these are masterworks that he really loves. "I first heard Brahms' Academic Overture when I was a young kid. I fell in love with this piece and always wanted to conduct it. We are doing the last movement of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, which is exciting and full of energy and somewhat dramatic. I look forward to the challenge of performing Bolero [Ravel] because it can easily ... speed up too fast or get loud too soon and ruin the experience, so I look forward to that kind of the challenge. And, Liszt [Les Préludes] is an amazing piece with all the different sides of being human – love, struggle, doubt and self-acceptance."

The concert is part of the TSO Artists in the Spotlight series. The soloists will be violist Teng Li and oboist Sarah Jeffrey. "They are both incredible musicians," Bard says. "It is an amazing thing for me to work with them and accompany them, with Sarah in particular, because we go back 20 years. We met at the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra.

"As somebody who came through the youth orchestra to be standing in front of the TSO today is a real dream come true."

The concerts take place May 31 and June 1 at Roy Thomson Hall.

Also, on June 15 at 7 p.m., Bard, alongside TSO conductor Peter Oundjian, will be part of the Luminato outdoor concert at David Pecaut Square, 215 King St. W. Also on the bill is soprano Simone Osborne. Bard will be conducting John Williams' Star Wars theme and José Pablo Moncayo's Huapango.

"All human beings have desires, doubts and unfulfilled feelings and I think that seeps directly into the artist's life," explains Bard, who moved to Toronto from Israel when he was 17.

"In music it is hard to avoid those yearnings, it is a great mirror for wanting something very badly and it has a way of describing it in a span of time perhaps better than experiencing it. As a Jewish person, and an Israeli/Canadian I have desires, struggles and appreciation of what I do have and where I come from and what it takes to get there."

Bard, who was resident conductor of Symphony Nova Scotia in 2011, made his TSO conducting debut in October 2012, with Maxim Vengerov performing Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto.

A career highlight was an invitation by Zubin Mehta to be acting principal clarinetist with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra for the 2001–2002 season. Over the last 15 years, he has performed as a soloist with many orchestras including the TSO, Edmonton Symphony Orchestra, and Kitchener-Waterloo Chamber Orchestra.

The 2014–2015 season will see him conducting the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra while continuing his post as conductor of the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra. ■

NOVELIST DOES FOR BIBLICAL PROPHECY WHAT J.K. ROWLING DID FOR WIZARDRY

Rabbi Dave Mason of the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Nachlaot is being honoured this week at the 18th annual IPPY (Independent Publishers) Awards ceremony in Manhattan for his acclaimed novel The Lamp of Darkness, the first book in his "Age of Prophecy" series (co-written with Mike Feuer). Chosen from more than 5,500 entries, the book focuses on the classic Biblical battle between Eliyahu and Ahab, and is deeply rooted in Jewish oral and mystical traditions.

Born in Connecticut, Mason studied law at New York University and worked as an attorney in Los Angeles before making aliyah in 2003. A self-professed Harry Potter junkie who specialized in two of the divisions of the Tanach, the Prophets and the Writings, the Ohr Sameach yeshiva graduate spent six years working on The Lamp of Darkness, focusing on the workings of prophecy just as Harry Potter author J. K. Rowling focused on wizardry.

"In comparison to J. K. Rowling, I have both an advantage and a disadvantage," Mason recently told the Connecticut Jewish Ledger. "She can make up whatever she wants, but I feel a responsibility to be faithful to the Jewish texts, so I can't make things up. At the same time, that gives me a story structure to work with. . . . The whole setting for the book is the battle between Eliyahu and Ahav, so I don't have to make a choice of where it's going." www.theageofprophecy.com

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

What's on the modern menu for Shavuot?

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Kim Kushner, author of The Modern Menu (Gefen Publishing House), is formerly from Montreal and now lives in New York City with her husband and three children. Passionate about food, Kushner teaches cooking classes, writes a food blog, collects cookbooks and is currently working on her second cookbook, focusing on family-style meals.

Her first book, The Modern Menu: Simple, Beautiful, Kosher, was published a year ago. It just went into its third printing, with 18,000 books in print, and is also available as an e-book. The photography by Andrew Zuckerman is breathtaking.

Kim organized her tried-and-true recipes into menus, named for the way the dishes make her feel. Her "vibrant" menu is filled with colour and flavour, her "crisp" menu is loaded with pleasing crunch. The menu arrangements are simply suggestions – readers are encouraged to mix and match.

Kushner is a graduate of the Institute of Culinary Education of Manhattan. She loves to try new ingredients, flavours, and techniques, and her recipes are innovative, foolproof and beautiful. Her healthy, seasonal and hearty salads, made from locally grown produce, are stellar in her culinary repertoire. Her love of cooking and eating began when she was a child and a member of a large, extended food-loving family. Her Moroccan-born mother was a huge inspiration in Kushner's style of cooking. Both mother and daughter work quickly in the kitchen, and both are extremely creative. They love Middle Eastern dishes, as reflected in many of Kim's recipes.

Cooking and baking are actually a family affair – Kim's sister, Jordana Levy, was one of the editors for the beautiful kosher dessert cookbook And Then There was Cake, a fundraising project of the Hebrew Academy in Montreal.

I asked Kushner to provide a "modern menu" including some of her favourite recipes for Shavuot, which begins on Tuesday evening, June 3. The following recipes would be equally welcome as healthier, lighter options for summertime entertaining. Enjoy! ■

Grilled Eggplant, Sun-Dried Tomato and Bocconcini Salad

Do it once and you will see the wisdom of grilling sliced eggplant in batches, allowing them to cool completely, and then freezing them in single layers in large freezer bags. When you have them on hand, you can make this salad in just minutes. The combination of flavours in this vibrant salad is delicious and unusual. Bocconcini ("small mouthfuls") are small mozzarella balls packed in water or olive oil; they can be found in most supermarkets.

- ❑ 1 large eggplant, cut into 1/4-in.-thick rounds
- ❑ olive oil, for brushing the grill pan
- ❑ 1 cup oil-packed sun-dried tomatoes, plus 2 tbsp. of their oil
- ❑ 1/2 cup bocconcini packed in oil
- ❑ 6 fresh basil leaves, torn into small pieces
- ❑ 3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper

Preheat the oven to 350. Place the eggplant slices in a colander and sprinkle with salt. Set aside for 10 minutes. Meanwhile, prepare a grill or heat a grill pan over high heat. Brush the pan with olive oil.

Pat the eggplant slices dry and grill until translucent and charred, about 3 minutes per side. Transfer the eggplant to a baking sheet and bake until soft, about 10 minutes. (At this point, the cooked eggplant can be stored in resealable plastic bags and frozen for up to 3 months. To use, thaw at room temperature until softened.)

Place the eggplant slices on a serving plate. Scatter the sun-dried tomatoes over, then drizzle the tomato oil on top. Scatter the bocconcini and basil on top. Drizzle with the balsamic vinegar and season with salt and pepper before serving. The dish can be made a day in advance, covered and refrigerated. Bring to room temperature before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

Mediterranean-Style Sea Bass

The assertive flavours of capers, garlic and sun-dried tomatoes make this 15-minute dish an ideal choice if you're craving the sunny flavours of the Mediterranean. If you want to add a little heat, sprinkle a few crushed red pepper flakes into the food processor before blending the ingredients together.

- ❑ 3 tbsp. capers, drained
- ❑ 8 oil-packed sun-dried tomato slices, plus 3 tbsp. of the oil
- ❑ 4 scallions, white parts only
- ❑ 2 garlic cloves, peeled
- ❑ kosher salt and freshly ground pepper
- ❑ 6 sea bass fillets, about 6 oz. each, skin removed

Combine the capers, sun-dried tomatoes and their oil, the scallions, and garlic in the bowl of a food processor and process until a paste forms, about 1 minute. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Place the fillets in a single layer in a baking dish. Using the back of a spoon, rub the paste all over the tops of the fillets. The fish can be covered and refrigerated at this point for a few hours.

Preheat the oven to 400. Cover the dish with aluminum foil and bake for about 12 minutes, until the fish flakes apart when pricked with a fork. Serves 6.

Cinnamon Hazelnut Pavlova with Raspberries

Nigella Lawson, one of Kim Kushner's absolute favourite celeb chefs, got her hooked on pavlova. She made it so many times that she began to adapt it as she went along. The recipe below is a reflection of all this toying around. This dessert is like a work of art and has all the essentials a great dessert should have: the glossy meringue shell is crisp and rich, the whipped cream topping is soft and delectable, and the raspberries add the perfect dose of tartness.

- ❑ 6 large egg whites
- ❑ 2 cups granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup skinned hazelnuts, ground
- ❑ 1 tbsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 2 cups heavy cream
- ❑ 1/2 cup packed dark brown sugar
- pinch of kosher salt
- ❑ 4 cups raspberries

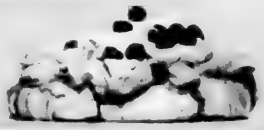
Preheat the oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

In the large bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the whisk attachment, beat the egg whites on medium speed until satiny peaks form. Add the sugar, 1/4 cup at a time, and continue beating until the mixture becomes stiff and very shiny. Using a spatula, fold in the hazelnuts, cinnamon and balsamic vinegar. Spoon the mixture onto the parchment-lined baking sheet, forming a 10-inch circle that is about 2 inches thick. Place in the oven, and immediately turn the oven down to 300. Bake for about 1 hour and 15 minutes, until the meringue looks and feel dry. Let cool in a dry place overnight.

Invert the pavlova onto a serving dish, peel away the parchment and flip over onto the dish.

Combine the cream and brown sugar in a large bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the whisk attachment. Whisk on medium speed until soft peaks form.

Spoon the whipped cream into the centre of the pavlova, leaving a 1-inch border. Sprinkle the raspberries over the cream and serve. Serves 10.



Novel lowers reader into the cauldron of anti-Semitism on campus

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Judith, a 30-ish Canadian who has been in Israel for 10 years, returns to Toronto because her father is dying, and promises to stay long enough to earn a degree in social work.

Enrolled in a fictitious college outside Toronto, she becomes immersed in the inescapable political culture of modern academia – a simmering pot of Marxist grievance, anti-colonization, the celebration of victimhood, and the demonization of enemies.

Fields of Exile, a new novel from Toronto writer Nora Gold, lowers the reader into this ideological cauldron from the perspective of her idealistic protagonist. Judith is a friendly, left-leaning feminist student who at first seems engaged and fascinated by the agenda of her leftist contemporaries.

All her classes – especially Introduction to Social Justice – seem infused with the same fashionable cocktail of values. She is somewhat naïve, however, for not realizing that her love of Israel will make her an outcast in this crowd.

Bright and knowledgeable about her chosen fields, she soon becomes bored by one of her professors who repeatedly denigrates "the white, Christian, male elite of Canada" for oppressing the masses. At such times she passes the time in class by daydreaming of making love with her former Israeli boyfriend, Moishe, symbolizing her beloved Israel. She can't wait for the school year to end so she can return from her temporary galut or exile.

Judith reacts as if she has been punched in the gut, too stunned to speak, when students in her social justice class spout anti-Israel hatred even while others plead for indulgence and cross-cultural understanding towards Afghan practices that would be regarded as backward and inhumane in the West.

This is not an isolated incident but the front of a wave of anti-Zionism that Judith correctly recognizes as ill-disguised anti-Semitism. Unused to ideological confrontations, she and her friends at first cannot find their tongues; like a rattlesnake, the hateful rhetoric, charms them into silence.

This is the Ariel Sharon era after the Rabin assassination. There's been a spate of suicide bombings and the Israelis retaliate with raids on Gaza, Ramallah and Jenin. Keeping in constant touch with her Israeli friends, Judith hears about each new development as it happens.

"If Israelis don't want any more of their children to get blown up, then they should give back what isn't theirs," one of her campus colleagues asserts. "All of it. Not just the West Bank or Gaza, but Jaffa, Akko, Jerusalem."

Judith enthusiastically accepts when Suzy, her most friendly professor, invites her to co-chair SWAC, the Social Work Anti-oppression Committee, which co-ordinates all of the school's anti-oppression activities. But the experience becomes a nightmare as the committee votes to invite a prominent anti-Israel activist, Michael Brier, to speak on Anti-Oppression Day. Brier calls himself a "soul brother" to the Martyrs of Vengeance, a terrorist group that has been sending suicide bombers into Israel.

Except for Judith, nobody on the committee seems bothered by this, and Judith, who has found her voice, cannot convince them that Israel and the Jewish people have a right to exist. The campus has become a hotbed of Orwellian doublespeak and mob conformism, a place where having or expressing a minority opinion could be dangerous.

Gold is too skilled a writer to allow this rich novel of ideas to descend into pure polemics. She allows Judith to expose the Israel-apartheid falsehood, for example, with ideas expressed in interior monologue and in conversation with her Canadian boyfriend, Bobby, and others. And she adeptly explores the notions of subjective and objective realities, and absolute versus relative cultural values, all without seeming to remove the narrative from the realm of the immediate story. Judith remains a well-rounded, passionate woman, much more than anyone's political mouthpiece; and she will be changed by the events of the story.

Caught in a nightmarish scenario in which justice has been overturned, Judith ends up feeling that : "Someone's crazy here – and I don't think it's me." This is precisely the feeling of any protagonist of a dystopian novel or film noir: isolated, betrayed, mistrusting of people around her, perhaps even on the run.

The story builds up to a campus rally on Anti-Oppression Day, which resembles one of the organized group-hate sessions in George Orwell's 1984. Otherwise nice folks energetically disseminate the despicable mantra, "End Zionist Imperialist Aggression and the Apartheid Jewish State," and even that perennial demon known as the blood libel raises its ugly little head. The climax and ending seem fitting, dramatic and, yes, surprising.

Fields of Exile begs comparisons to Shirley Jackson's The Lottery. It also reminds me of a few deeply-felt novels focusing on social wrongs involving the Jewish community such as Gwethalyn Graham's Earth and High Heaven (1944) and Laura Z. Hobson's Gentleman's Agreement (1947), both of which exposed variations of the polite country-clubbish anti-Semitism of their day. Sadly, the current brew seems a lot more virulent and toxic.

The author of a previous well-received collection of stories titled Marrow, Gold is a highly competent writer and reportedly the first to focus on the shocking anti-Israel climate now prevalent on many Canadian and American campuses. Disturbing and threatening incidents against Jewish and pro-Israel students have been reported on many campuses, so the issue is certainly current.

Gold, the editor of the online literary journal Jewish Fiction.net, has long worked on campuses in Toronto and southern Ontario. Fields of Exile has such a ring of truth and veracity about it that, sadly, one suspects she was writing from life. ■

MARRIED WITH CHILDREN

I'd love to slow down, but I'm too busy being busy

Lauren Kramer

There are times when I find myself making a mental list at day's end, for no reason other than to wonder in amazement at what I've accomplished. Most of the items on the list are invisible to, and unnoticed by, the rest of the family, so part of my tabulation is about pure recognition. When my legs are weary and my mind irritable from the strain of rushing from one task to the next, I need that congratulatory pat on the back, even if I have to deliver it myself.

My list is likely not that different from yours, with a few substitutions here or there. On an average day, it might contain: researched and wrote stories, returned phone calls, tidied house, two loads of laundry washed-folded-put-away, picked up groceries, moved kids from A to B and back to A while cleaning up residues of food-homework-general mess en route, cut the grass, baked cookies and challah buns, made dinner, kitchen gleaming, pulled weeds, went for a run, comforted crying children, mitigated fights, and flopped into bed to review a book before sleeping so I can repeat the list again the next day.

I'm a busy gal, and when my friends and I exchange notes on how our days and weeks are going, the conversation often turns to busyness. "Look how crazy busy things are in my family," we tell each other. There's always so much on the go – no time for getting together, deep conversation or sheer fun. We're running frantically to keep up on the treadmill of our lives, our cellphones buzzing, beeping and whistling at us along the way, reminding us of the ceaseless cycle of appointments, emails, texts and to-do lists awaiting our attention.

I can't help but notice that our busyness has become both a source of pride and irritation. The pride stems from how much we do, and the suspicion that we're likely doing, accomplishing and ticking off way more than our friends and neighbours. "Look at how productive I am," we congratulate ourselves as we text, email and call even as little hands tug on our sleeves hoping for a smidgen of attention. "Mom's too busy to talk right now," we say, as we add another inane tweet to the twittersphere, a "like" on Facebook, or a quick email executed in the 30 seconds before the traffic light changes. The irritation comes from a recognition that there's no end to this busyness, and that no matter how much we do, there's always more. Lots more.

Really, what's the point of being so dreadfully busy?

I interviewed an author on the subject many years ago, a man who advocated daily naps and a slower pace of life. "You'll never guess what my grandfather's final words were in the seconds before he died," he told me. "He turned to his wife and said, 'Don't forget to pay the gardener.'" Even in his dying breath, this man was mentally ticking items off his to-do list. Is this where I'm headed, too?

It's stressful living life at this pace, and there's no finish line in sight. What's more, the cycle is self-perpetuating. The moment we slow down, we remember how much more there is to do.

The mental list is a pointless exercise, I realize on clear-headed days. There are no extra points earned for brilliant levels of busyness, just more busy around the next corner. The point is to slow down on that treadmill and remember to carefully disembark so we can heed those tugging little hands, spend more time in warm embraces and be fully attentive to the precious moments of our lives long before we're carried off in a casket. ■

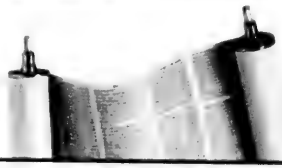
Naso | Numbers 4:21 – 7:89



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier says peace at home is essential for communal well-being Rabbi Denise Handlarski argues Jewish feminists should pay close attention to Naso
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen recalls the utter joy of issuing the priestly blessings with his family

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

Recently, I participated in a mission to Israel with almost 600 other members of our Montreal Jewish community. In addition to the experience of visiting Israel, there was another aspect of our trip that seemed, at times, miraculous: the logistics of moving so many people on such a tight schedule from place to place, day after day. I thought of this in a biblical context: imagine moving a whole nation in the desert for 40 years!

The first chapters of the book of Bamidbar (Numbers) are concerned with these logistics. Once the logistics are taken care of, and once the nation is positioned to move, one would think that it would be time to get moving. Instead, we have laws about stealing, the suspected adulteress and the Nazirite. What are these laws doing here?

These situations reflect possible breakdowns in our society: theft occurs when there's a breakdown of mutual respect. Suspected marital infidelity can occur when there's a distance between husband and wife. The situation of the Nazirite – one who separates himself or herself from society – can occur when the status quo doesn't provide room for personal growth.

Ralbag, the 14th-century biblical commentator and philosopher, explains how the laws of stealing, the suspected adulteress and the Nazirite are connected. He writes that the Torah is concerned with eradicating those elements that lead to contention and strife. In a more positive vein, these laws remind us how important personal peace and tranquility in the home are to our personal and communal well-being.

We invest so much time and effort in the logistics of our daily life. The message of our parshah is that keeping ourselves and our families strong are even more important. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Naso contains a description of the trial by ordeal for a suspected adulteress. Any man who suspects his wife to have been with another man brings her before the priest, where she's given water laden with written curses and dirt from the Tabernacle. These were thought not to harm the innocent but to create a distended belly (implying a lack of ability to carry children to term) in the guilty.

The Torah is often read as a book of laws, but in this case, it's the narrative of the ordeal that seems to be more important than the prescriptions for its practice. Comfortingly, there's no evidence this ordeal was ever carried out. So why would its ritual be described so fully? Perhaps as a caution: women must be tightly regulated to maintain the "purity" of the birth line.

This fits with the rest of Naso, which includes commandments for the ill and defiled to be excised and for purifications of, and dedications to, the Temple. The parshah as a whole centres on the idea of cleanliness, purification and sacred space. We learn from this how to create separate and special space and time, such as the rituals and rest of Shabbat and home preparation for Pesach.

The depiction of the trial by ordeal reflects an effort to create a sense of distinct nationhood among the people. Adultery on the part of women, seen as threatening the "cleanliness" of the bloodline, had to be discouraged. The word nation comes from the Latin natio – to be born. Nationhood has virtually universally relied on the control of women for its creation and perpetuation. While the ritual as described is undoubtedly misogynist, I find this parshah is actually a perfect text for Jewish feminists to study and contemplate.

As a new mother, I've been thinking of the power of women to give new life. It's this power that the trial of the suspected adulteress tries, but fails, to contain. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

In this week's parshah, Naso, we read about the commandment to the kohanim to bless the people on behalf of God.

There is the three-fold blessing of "yevarecha," "yaer" and "yisa." It's no coincidence that we read these blessings very close to Shavuot, when we received the Torah at Mount Sinai. It teaches us that by keeping the holy Torah and strengthening our commitment to keeping mitzvot, we receive God's blessings.

Yevarechecha: God blesses and protects us.

Yaer: he makes us favourable in the eyes of other nations.

Yisa: God forgives us and brings us peace.

A Jew needs to always remember it's God's blessing that gives him the riches he has, and he should use his wealth wisely.

One of my favourite moments is when on the holidays, my father, my son and I turn around, face the congregation and recite the priestly blessings, singing the beautiful melody together.

We will soon mark the 20th year of the Lubavitcher Rebbe's yahrzeit, may his merit protect us. On Sundays, the Rebbe would stand outside his office and greet and give a blessing to all who came. He would often stand for hours, as thousands came for a blessing or advice.

He was once asked how he had the strength to stand all day, for eight hours, non-stop?

With a smile, he replied, "When I see all these people, it's like counting diamonds. One doesn't grow weary when counting a beautiful diamond."

May we always see the positive and good in each other, bless each other for good, as did our forefather and patriach, Abraham. Let us increase goodness and kindness with another mitzvah, and in being united, may we merit the coming of the Mashiach, with the priestly blessings, in our holy Temple, in Jerusalem, speedily in our days! ■

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen is rabbi of Ohalei Yoseph Yitzchak Congregation in Toronto.

Marc Dunec: Torontonian seeks seat in U.S. Congress

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Mark Dunec is a native Torontonian who attended Associated Hebrew Schools as well as the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). Today, however, his ties are to the Garden State, New Jersey. Married, with U.S.-born children, Dunec, 38, is contesting the Democratic party nomination as a Congressional candidate for New Jersey's 11th District. The party's candidate will be chosen on June 3. The mid-term elections take place on Nov. 4. Dunec spoke to The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

Why and when did you move to the United States, and why are you running for Congress?

I moved in 1999 for business school at Pace University, in New York City. I basically moved to the United States for business opportunities. I met a very nice New Jersey girl on the Upper West Side. You marry a New Jersey girl, you move to New Jersey. That's just how it works.

For the last 7-1/2 years, I've been working at FTI Consulting, a publicly traded global management consulting company. I'm the managing director in the real estate solutions practice and I'm based in New York City.

I'm running for Congress for many reasons. It's all about the economy, getting people back to work, encouraging investment. It's not often you hear Democrats talking about that. Our national debt is north of $17.2 trillion. That's a concern for me and many people, not just because I'm fiscally responsible, but that's huge if we're running on deficits every single year and accumulating and adding to the debt. Somebody has to focus on that, and it might as well be me.

You say this is an issue Democrats don't talk about, so why are you running as a Democrat?

For my three pillars. I'm a Democrat for three primary reasons: women's rights, gay rights, minority rights.

Did you have any political experience in Canada?

No, and I have no political experience in the United States, either. I never ran for mayor, or on the municipal, county or state levels.

I'm not a career politician. I'm not going into this for money. I'd be taking a pay cut if I get into Congress. This is not about financial gain. This is all about trying to move the country forward.

Marc Dunec

> I'm running for Congress for many reasons. It's all about the economy, getting people back to work, encouraging investment. It's not often you hear Democrats talking about that. Our national debt is north of $17.2 trillion. That's a concern for me and many people, not just because I'm fiscally responsible, but that's huge if we're running on deficits every single year and accumulating and adding to the debt. Somebody has to focus on that, and it might as well be me.

I don't believe in partisan politics. I'm a professional problem solver. For me, it's all about creative solutions to move our country forward.

When you say you want to tackle the deficit and the debt, it almost sound like you're running as an opposition figure.

Am I running as an opposition figure? Paul Ryan, who is chair of the House Budget committee, is a Republican. He just put out a budget. I don't agree with it. The Democratic Party needs a counterbalance to Paul Ryan. I'm it. I'm a numbers guy, I can speak his language, and I can speak to the country, not just within the 11th District. I want to tackle federal problems.

My goal is to work in the House Budget Committee. I'm hoping they would look at my education and experience and say, of all the 435 members in the House, this guy has an MBA in finance. He has an interest in working in the House Budget Committee, let's put him in there. Kind of silly to put him somewhere else.

Does the fact you're from Canada help or hurt you in seeking the Democratic nomination, or is it not a factor at all?

I have a primary June 3 where two individuals are running against me. I have received the endorsements of the party from all four counties that make up my district. So the party is behind me.

This is my first election, so I don't know what to expect. Anything can happen on primary day.

Have you incorporated any Canadian political ideas in your campaign?

Yes. I don't want to call it a Canadian idea, although some people say, "Ah, now we understand. You're from Toronto." The Affordable Care Act (ACA) is very polarizing in the United States. I'm in favour of the ACA, because I believe health is a right, not a privilege. Period.

There have been technological bloopers taking place, but no big program that rolls out is going work 100 per cent right off the bat. The ACA, just like any major program, is experiencing hitches. I'm speaking with voters everywhere, from both sides of the aisle. And they're questioning how I can support this.

I go on the offence. I say what this country needs is universal health care, single payer system. I would say the number 1 issue I'm running on is universal health care. And I'm championing it for three reasons. Number 1, it's a right, not a privilege. Number 2, I know right off the top we'll save 20 per cent minimum in administrative costs. And I know it will stimulate the economy through entrepreneurship and innovation.

You've said you want to grow the economy through spending. Hasn't that been tried and found wanting? And how can you do that while reducing the deficit?

We all know the economy has to grow through spending. You can have infrastructure spending. In New Jersey, the infrastructure is crumbling and it has to be done now.

When I say spending, I believe in public-private partnership in almost everything, including my universal health care system. In my mind, it means the government pays for it, but it's being run by the private sector.

Also I believe, the way we get the economy to grow [is through] my corporate tax plan. What really hit me when I reviewed the numbers [is that] corporate taxes comprise less than 10 per cent [of government tax revenue]. There's something fundamentally wrong with that if the corporate tax rate is 35 per cent, one of the highest in the world.

Your answer?

Complex tax code, loopholes, special interest influence. You will always find a loophole. So it's a problem. I want to greatly reduce that problem. I would eliminate the corporate tax. I would mandate minimum earnings distributions and that would be taxed at 40 per cent.

There's $2 trillion in U.S. corporate profits sitting abroad and it's not coming home. If you no longer have the corporate tax, the money could come home, it would be distributed and the people will spend it. The government will get its tax, and the people will spend it and it will go through the economy.

Are you happy with your government's policies vis-a-vis Israel?

Big picture, the way we solve conflict not just in the Middle East but around the world is by encouraging my three pillars of why I am a Democrat. Once we have around the world and the Middle East women's rights, gay rights, minority rights, everything is solved.

Are you happy with the policy your government is pursuing vis-a-vis Iran?

Let me take this a step back. America does not have an issue with England, or France having nuclear weapons. The reason is because we share the same values. I do not believe that I share the same values, not necessarily with the Iranian people but with the Iranian government, because of their repeated calls to wipe Israel off the map. That's not normal talk. So in my mind, Iran can never have a nuclear capability.

Twilight of a Jewish dynasty

Backstory

EROL ARAF

Seventy years ago this spring, the last scion of one of the greatest European and Oriental Jewish banking dynasties, 21-year-old Bertrand Camondo Reinach, was brutally murdered in the Monowitz-Buma concentration camp.

The Camondo saga unfolded on a vast historical canvas starting with the Spanish Inquisition and culminating in the Nazi genocide. A family of sages and rabbis, the Camondos, after the Expulsion from Spain, found themselves in the Venetian Ghetto and eventually landed on the shores of the Sublime Porte, becoming financiers of sultans in Constantinople. But, Paris, the capital of the 19th century, drew the family to France in 1869, where, in a few decades, they built one of the greatest banking fortunes in the world.

Throughout the years of fame and wealth, they displayed a sense of gratitude for countries that welcomed them, and they expressed it with boundless generosity. So profound was their contribution to the unification of Italy that they were honoured by King Victor Emmanuel II with titles. In Turkey, they donated palaces, sumptuous residences and prime parcels of land in the heart of Istanbul to the state while making signal contributions to the emancipation of Turkish Jewry.

When patriarch Abraham Solomon de Camondo passed away in Paris in 1873, in accordance with his last wishes, his remains were brought to Turkey. In an unprecedented gesture, Sultan Abdulaziz accorded him the rare honour of a state funeral attended by all faith communities. In France, too, they demonstrated their love for their newly adopted country by gifting the single largest collection of priceless works of art to the Louvre and donating their belle époque residences to various foundations.

Life in Paris was redolent with celebrities gliding from the pages of Marcel Proust into the salons of the aristocracy in the leafy suburbs of Saint-Germain, Saint Honoré and Park Monceau. At the fabled Camondo residences, it was always possible to encounter the Rothschilds, the Pereires, the Foulds, the Cahens d'Anvers, Emile Zola, as well as Cezanne, Degas or Renoir.

But the Dreyfus Affair cast a long shadow, and, unbeknown to the Camondos, it was a prelude to calamity.

World War I brought the Gilded Age to an abrupt end. The last direct male descendant, Nissim de Camondo, was killed during aerial combat in 1917. His sister,

> World War I brought the gilded age to an end

Beatrice de Camondo, her husband Leon Reinach, the noted composer and their two children, Fanny and Bertrand, thus became the last of the Camondos.

The final chapter in this tragic tale opened with Nazi boots trampling on the ancient cobblestones of the City of Light in 1940.

By then, Beatrice had already separated from her husband, converted to Catholicism and lived with her daughter, Fanny, while indulging her lifelong equestrian passion. Leon, who lived with Bertrand in Neuilly sur Seine during the Nazi occupation, was also deeply involved in his compositions and philanthropic work. The idea that they might be in danger did not cross their minds. They had gifted most of their fortune to France. Leon had fought for his country and Nissim, Beatrice's brother, was a national hero.

Indeed, thanks to their highly placed connections, the Reinachs were able to evade the noose of the Gestapo for a while. Warned of impending arrest, Leon and Bertrand tried to escape to Spain, but were betrayed by an acquaintance, arrested, taken to Drancy and then deported to Auschwitz together with Fanny on Convoy 62, in November 1943. Beatrice was deported on Convoy 69 in March 1944.

As fate would have it, Madeline Dreyfus Levy, Alfred Dreyfus' granddaughter, was also on Convoy 62.

While Leon, Beatrice and Fanny perished soon after their arrival in Auschwitz, Bertrand's end was as prolonged as it was horrendous. He was severely beaten before the eyes of his father and sister for refusing to board the train in Drancy, but he miraculously survived and worked in labour camps and salt mines until the spring of 1944. There were unconfirmed reports describing his demise: apparently, he collapsed from exhaustion and was unable to stand up, despite repeated warnings. Finally, a guard kicked him viciously and then bashed the base of his skull with a shovel.

As Proust might have said, what remains is merely the chagrin, the pity and the dust of remembrance. ■

A Salute to Our Community and its Volunteers

Volunteers: the engine that drives UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Friends,

There's a popular quote that sums up our feelings about the extraordinary individuals who, year after year, give of themselves as volunteers on behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Volunteers are not paid - not because they are worthless, but because they are priceless," goes the old adage, and, as the Chairs of UJA's Annual Campaign 2015, we couldn't agree more. Whether it is lending their skills to UJA telethons, the Walk with Israel, or for one of UJA Federation's 100-plus community agencies, it is our cadre of volunteers that helps make Jewish Toronto so remarkable. It is also thanks to the commitment of these individuals that the programs and agencies funded by UJA dollars are able to continue their transformative work and improve the lives of Jews in Toronto, Israel and across the globe.

A UJA Campaign succeeds because of the hard work of a team of more than 700 volunteers. Our entire team will work hard for only one reason: to help people. The more successful the Campaign is, the more people that can be helped.

And, if you're still on the sidelines, debating whether or not you, too, could play a hands-on role in the success of the UJA Annual 2015 Campaign, and by extension, our Jewish community as a volunteer, think no more! To get involved, call Shira Lester Cohen at 416.631.5684 or at slester-cohen@ujafed.org and find a volunteer role you find personally satisfying. You'll be amazed at how much you get back, simply by giving your time.

On behalf of the many people who are helped by the UJA, thank you.

As Jewish Toronto continues to grow and flourish, it is so important that we acknowledge the vital efforts of the volunteers who contribute each and every day to our remarkable community.

In the pages that follow, you will learn about some of our community's most altruistic and passionate members, all of whom give of their time and use their unique talents to help UJA Federation in supporting our most vulnerable, advocating for Israel, and promoting Jewish education and identity.

A community as wonderful and united as Jewish Toronto doesn't simply "happen". It is through the efforts of these unique individuals who work to ensure that our community maintains its position as one of the strongest in the Diaspora, providing our children – the future leaders of our community – with the necessary tools to live full and proud Jewish lives.

We hope that you enjoy this volunteer supplement and that by reading its stories you too will be inspired to join the ranks of the volunteers who day after day, year after year, add so much to the fabric of our wonderful community. You will be surprised just how much you get by giving back.

Thank you!

Sincerely,

Volunteers' selfless work is G-d's work

Rabbi Deborah Landsberg

It was a personal religious crisis and I needed a rabbi, so I turned to Rabbi Ilan Feldman of Congregation Beth Jacob. I trusted his wisdom and kindness and knew I could speak openly. I was at that time a young assistant rabbi at The Temple in Atlanta and had begun to find myself distracted during services, focussed more on page numbers and announcements than on praying. I was disturbed by this; maybe I couldn't serve the community as a rabbi and still be a good Jew.

At best I recall that conversation in his study, Rabbi Feldman did not give me advice but a story. It went something like this: when he was a young rabbi leading services he found himself distracted, focussed on page numbers rather than prayer. So he had turned to his father-in-law, Rabbi Yaakov Weinberg (z"l), Rosh Yeshiva of Ner Yisrael in Baltimore, to lay out his fears and concerns. And his father-in-law did not give him advice but a question. "Why do you think God wants your prayers? Maybe He wants you to announce page numbers."

We are living in an age of "spirituality" - a time in which our culture and literature and public discourse extol the quest for a soulfulness which puts personal fulfillment and individual contentment at the core of its concern. And that is good. But it is only part of any good Jewish story. We are, through this supplement, honouring those whose understanding of obligation is equally rooted in the commitment to communal service as much as the pursuit of spiritual discipline. We know that communal needs are not always evidently "uplifting." Samson Raphael Hirsch noted that this sacred work demands self-denial and sustained faithfulness and devotion. And those who diligently give of themselves because their people need them often do so quietly, without fanfare or renumeration, simply because they know in their deepest beings that their work is G-d's work.

For all those we honour today - for the volunteers throughout these pages and throughout the household of Israel - bind the people of Israel together. We recall Rabban Gamliel the son of Rabbi Yehudah HaNasi's teaching in Pirke Avot 2:2 and declare: may their work be L'shem Shamayim, for the sake of Heaven, and their righteousness will stand forever.

Toronto community steps up to help ice storm victims

UJA volunteers offer warmth, despite frigid temperatures

UJA Federation set up a warming centre to help those in need during December's ice storm that struck the GTA in late December.

By Daniel Horowitz

Toronto community steps up to help ice storm victims. In response to the ice storm that struck the GTA in late December, a warming station was opened Dec. 22 at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont. Overnight shelter for those in need was provided, as well as light snacks, beverages, hot coffee and water.

From Dec 22 to 24, a total of about 10 guests were there each day, including a young family of five and a senior woman.

The overnight shelter stopped receiving guests by about 8 p.m. Dec. 24, when the service was deemed no longer necessary.

Volunteers also helped deliver water and snacks to seniors trapped in their apartments along the Bathurst Street corridor from Finch to Steeles avenues – to people who had no power, no heat and no water, as the apartment pumps were down.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto received a call Monday night from Circle of Care about these seniors. By the next morning, the agency had determined which buildings needed help most, and it sent out the call for volunteers. By the afternoon, the necessary supplies were in the Lipa Green Building lobby. More than 150 volunteers lined up to collect the supplies and learn which buildings they were to cover. Most had to walk up the stairs (up to 16 floors), and they delivered the packages to 225 seniors in nine buildings.

"Within hours of the storm taking hold, and despite the fact our central offices were shut down due to the power failure, UJA Federation's senior professional team convened regularly by conference call to assess the situation and provide leadership and support in whatever way we could," said Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Fortunately, our offsite computer and phone backup systems met their biggest challenge ever, working as planned for such emergencies, and we were able to remain in contact with each other, our partner agencies and the community. And wow did the community respond!"

IsraAID trains Philippine locals in post-trauma treatment

UJA Emergency Relief Fund has raised more than $184,000 to support organization's efforts

By Daniel Horowitz

The death toll from Typhoon Haiyan in the Philippines has increased to 5,500, with more than 26,000 injured, close to 1,800 people reported missing, and more than a million homes destroyed.

Authorities fear the death toll will climb since emergency workers continue to retrieve more bodies as they clear debris.

More than 3.5 million people were displaced by the typhoon, which slammed into the eastern Philippines with record winds of more than 300km/h on November eighth.

Upon news of the tragedy, United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto quickly launched its Philippines Typhoon Relief Fund, which has already raised more than $184,000, all of which will go towards supporting the life-saving work of IsraAID, UJA's partner agency, which has had a team of professionals on the ground since the typhoon struck.

IsraAID team members are sharing their post-trauma knowledge with Philippino professionals.

After tending to the humanitarian needs of those victimized by the typhoon, the IsraAID team this week began a psychosocial program in Ormoc, Philippines, with 50 local professionals, among them daycare teachers, social workers, government employees and community leaders.

"This program enables our local counterparts to learn from Israel's decades of experience in post trauma treatment," explains Shachar Zahavi, the Founding Director of IsraAID. "The psychosocial program will complement our medical work which would become a holistic health program. Our hosts in the Philippines are constantly expressing their admiration and gratitude to the Israeli (government and non government) aid efforts by treating our teams as if we were part of their family. Their willingness to learn from Israel's experience in disaster intervention is admirable especially as the Philippines are affected by natural disasters on a yearly basis."

UJA Day raises $7,000 for UJA Annual Campaign 2015

Future community leaders shine at TanenbaumCHAT

By Daniel Horowitz

Whoever coined the phrase "youth is wasted on the young" obviously never met the students at the Anne and Max TanenbaumCHAT Wilmington Avenue Campus.

The philanthropic-minded teens recently held their annual UJA Day fundraiser and awareness program, and thanks to their creativity, energy, and collective desire to make a difference in the Jewish world, an impressive $7,000 was raised for UJA's Annual Campaign 2015.

Led by Student Chairs Ya'ara Avitzur, Aviva Levman, Yael Matlow, Talya Shulman and Carly Sugar, the students used a number of initiatives to raise funds including selling coffee, donuts, ice cream sundaes, cotton candy, snow cones and hamburgers.

"It's always exciting to see our school community rally behind an important organization such as UJA," said Josh Sable, Director of Student Activities, TanenbaumCHAT Wilmington Avenue Campus. "Our student leaders ran an outstanding program that was creative, educational and inspirational. It's important for the Jewish youth at our school to continue to find ways to connect with the larger Jewish community. Ultimately, today's Jewish teens are the future leaders of our Jewish community and we're fortunate to have an amazing core of future leaders here at TanenbaumCHAT."

"It was a really great experience being heads of the UJA day committee at CHAT this year," enthused Yael Matlow. "Being on the organizing side of a fundraising event was hard work however the planning part was fun and the results were extremely rewarding."

"We feel that it's very important for people our age to begin to make a contribution in our community and are so glad that we had this opportunity," said Talya Shulman.

Raffle tickets were also sold to students and school staff with winners landing great prizes including tickets to a Toronto Maple Leaf game, an iPad, Lulu Lemon gift cards and much more.

At lunchtime, students purchased Bingo cards to play for a chance to win Maple Leaf playoff tickets.

The Student Chairs also created a creative and informative video and display for the student body featuring educational material about UJA and the more than 100 partner agencies and schools the organization supports.

"So many of our fellow Jews are helped by programs funded by the UJA Campaign," said Yael's proud father, David, who is Co-Chairing the 2015 UJA Annual Campaign with Andrea Cohen. "In our own city, 12 percent of Jews live below the poverty line. All of us who can should do our part to help Jewish people in need. It is a proud moment when our children realize they too share this responsibility."

Talya Shulman's father Steven Shulman, who is also UJA's Campaign Director and Counsel, expressed his pride in the students' leadership and the school. "I know that these TanenbaumCHAT students made independent decisions to take on this responsibility. Their leadership is a result of the wonderful Jewish values reinforced by a school which UJA's Campaign proudly supports."

Three-Year-Old learns tzedakah, volunteerism, via UJA's Walk with Israel

By Daniel Horowitz

When UJA professionals showed up at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Campus recently, little did long-time UJA and community volunteer Tina Erlich think it would start her three-year-old daughter's philanthropic and volunteer career.

But, apparently, that's exactly what transpired.

The UJA folks were at Associated as part of their annual Walk with Israel presentations, letting the young students know about the Walk which takes to the streets of downtown Toronto on Sunday, May 25th.

When Tina was going through daughter Isabelle's school bag later that day, she came across a Walk with Israel white board that was given out to the students.

Later, as little Isabelle was drawing on the board, she told her mom repeatedly, "I'm doing tzedakah, mommy!"

Beaming with pride, Tina, who had been fundraising for the Walk with Israel on behalf of her daughter since Isabelle was six months old, quickly seized the opportunity to explain the heady concept of giving back to one's community to the new Walk enthusiast.

"For some reason that Walk with Israel white board really resonated with Isabelle, and I was able to use that connection to explain to my daughter why it's so important to raise money for the Walk, and how it helps people in Israel," says Tina. "And, as someone who has always taken part in the Walk, I couldn't be prouder that this important community event was her entry point into tzedakah."

Tina, whose parents moved from Montreal to Toronto in 1983 when Tina was a year younger than Isabelle is today, recently began her third year as Co-Chair of UJA's Young Leaders, and before that she Co-Chaired Programming and Young Business for UJA Young Leaders. She also sat on the Walk with Israel Committee for two years where she was in charge of young recruitment. And, just in case that philanthropic resume isn't impressive enough, Tina also volunteered at UJA telethons throughout her high school years, and was a chaperone on the 2008 March of the Living.

Tina Erlich with daughter Isabelle

"Both my parents became volunteers immediately and took us with them because there was no one to watch me and my brothers," says Tina. "My parents chaired the Walk and the Festival when I was 9 years old. We had participated in the walk before but never at this level. As we walked, I remember feeling this enormous sense of pride, not because my parents were Chairs, but because we were a part of this amazing community, that came together for one day and that was raising money that would help Israelis in need. Because of my parents' UJA involvement, I have many memories of that sense of pride and knew when my daughter - and subsequently - my son was born, that I wanted to share that with them. This year will be her third Walk with Israel and my son's second. I hope that as they grow, they will feel the same amount of pride and maybe one day gratitude, like I do for my parents because they taught me the importance of tzedakah and allowed me to be a part of UJA and the amazing Jewish community of Toronto."

Fortunately, based on Tina's philanthropic pedigree and the fact that tzedakah is in her DNA, it's safe to say that these apples will not fall far from the tree.

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women on pages B5-B7 have made tzedakah, tikkun olam and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They will receive their awards on May 27th at UJA Federation's Awards Night.

Ben Sadowski Award of Merit

UJA Federation created this award in 1960, the single most prestigious acknowledgement the Jewish community bestows upon a volunteer with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities
With his unwavering commitment to people, Ben Sadowski z"l, the first President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), embodied the definition of a natural leader. This award is his legacy to the Jewish community.

DAVID ENGEL

A native Montrealer, David Engel has held numerous positions across this country's Jewish community, beginning in 1978 with Federation CJA of Montreal as Chair of the Young Leadership Division. After moving to Toronto in 1983, David was introduced to UJA through Young Leadership and worked his way up through UJA Federation, volunteering for roles including Chair of the Annual Walk with Israel, Vice-Chair and Chair of Campaign 2000, and then UJA Federation Treasurer. He became UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Chair in June 2005, and President of Federations Canada in 2008. Currently he is the Chair of the Past Campaign Chair Committee, the Treasurer of CIJA and the incoming Chair of the Birthright Foundation. David has won a number of prestigious communal awards including the Leadership Development Award, the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Leadership, both from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and the Julie Koschitzky Award for Young Leadership from UIA Federations Canada. David credits his love for community to his parents Anna and Issie z"l, both of whom were respected community leaders in Montreal. Engel owns a Marketing services company, Innovative Graphics, which helps North American direct marketers increase their response rates by making their marketing efforts more effective, and sits on the board of the Canadian Marketing Association. He is married to Judy and has three children, Tina, Paul and Daniel.

"Volunteerism has shaped and enriched my life beyond measure. I am grateful for the opportunity to serve this community in many leadership capacities. Former recipients of the Ben Sadowski Award have been my mentors and my friends. My hope is that I have inspired future leaders in the way that they have inspired me."

Community Israel Engagement Award

The Community Israel Engagement Award recognizes a program or an organization whose leadership is committed to making Israel Engagement a core part of its mission and vision, and to integrating Israel into all areas of institutional life. It honours excellence in cultivating deep, real, and multi-faceted relationships between its stakeholders and Israel.

JULIA GLUCK, FCMC

Born in Ottawa, Julia has lived in Toronto for most of her life. She is married and has one son who recently made aliyah. Julia's family has belonged to the First Narayever Congregation since 1987. Julia was a management consultant for over 30 years, and had over 40 years of business experience when she retired. Julia provided her clients with workplace learning programs to increase knowledge, build skills and change attitudes. Her Honours BA in Judaic Studies was granted jointly by the University of Toronto and Hebrew University. She is a Fellow of the Institute of Certified Management Consultants of Ontario, where she volunteers. She served on the First Narayever's Board of Governors for six years as Vice President, President and Past President, and has served as the Site Supervisor for our ShinShinim program for over two years. Julia and her husband have spent a month or two of the winter in Israel for several years now, and will be spending more time now that their son has made aliyah.

"My experience with the ShinShinim program has been extremely rewarding personally; my relationship with the ShinShinim and their families is very special for me, my husband and son. The program has also enabled me to get to know my community much better, and to work with UJA Federation for the first time."

Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

This award honours individuals who exemplify the best in United Jewish Appeal campaigning When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were more committed than Phil Granovsky z"l, who saw Israel and the Diaspora as an extension of his family. Phil's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year

LAURIE SHEFF

Laurie Sheff has been a volunteer leader and role model at UJA Federation for many years. Over the years, Laurie has held numerous positions including Co-Chair of the ATID Next Gen education and leadership program, Co-Chair, with her husband Jonny, of the 2011 UJA Walk with Israel, Chair of UJA's Women's Philanthropy Campaign 2013 and Co-Chair of Campaign Operations, Campaign 2014. This year Laurie will serve as Co-Chair of UJA'S Major Gifts Division. Laurie is a past board member of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Hillel of Greater Toronto and is currently a board member of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Laurie and Jonny live in Toronto and have three boys; Matthew, Thomas & Ezra.

"My involvement with UJA has allowed me to be an active participant in our community I have had the privilege of working with many professionals and volunteers, all of who lead by example every day, and I have seen the direct impact of this collective effort across the globe. Phil Granovsky was one of our community's greatest leaders and I am honoured to be this year's recipient of the award that bears his name."

Harold Lederman Award for Philanthropic Leadership

This award, named for Harold Lederman z"l, is presented by UJA's Past Chairs Council to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer who has demonstrated exceptional commitment and achievement of innovative approaches to challenges in the community. Harold, driven by a keen social conscience and strong support for Jewish communal life, believed in the importance of continuity. His message to future generations was to be responsible, a legacy of a real philanthropic leader.

HARRY GORMAN

Harry Gorman has been an active community volunteer for more than 50 years. Growing up, he was inspired by his parents, Moshe and Reva Gorman who, in spite of very modest means, had always exemplified tzedakah and the importance of helping those in need.

Over the years, Harry made sure his parents' values lived on through his steadfast volunteer and philanthropic commitments. His community involvement includes Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, of which Harry is a founding member. Harry also chaired a successful UJA Annual Campaign and remains a dedicated canvasser to this day. In 1991, the Jewish National Fund honoured Harry at their annual Negev Dinner. Together with Hy and Bertha Shore, Harry established the Gorman Shore Awards – professional development scholarships that are presented annually to exemplary employees at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Harry is also the recipient of the UJA Federation Ben Sadowski Award of Merit.

Harry is President and Board Member of Wycliffe International. Last year, he and his wife, Sara, celebrated their 66th wedding anniversary. They are the proud parents of four children and have 11 grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

"I feel blessed and privileged that my own success has enabled me to give back to others and make a difference. This award is especially meaningful to me because of the longstanding relationship I shared with my good friend, Harold Lederman z"l. I consider my years of volunteering to have been a priceless experience and just as I've been taught, I hope that I too have been a mentor for the next generation. It hasn't been about what I have given, rather it has been about what I have gained."

Volunteer Excellence:
Leadership Development Awards

These awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

MICKI MIZRAHI

Micki was born and raised in Ottawa in a family committed to the Jewish community. Upon moving to Toronto Micki worked with various committees with Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center as Co-Chair of Spirit of Hope, 2014, Mount Sinai Hospital, Canadian Friends of Israel Museum, Holy Blossom Pre-School and UJA. Most recently, within UJA, Micki was Co-Chair of the Lion of Judah division for two years, Co-Chair of Atarah division, Co-Chair of the 2012 and 2013 Walk with Israel, and is an active member on the Israel Engagement Committee (focus: CHAT) She is on the Board of Directors of the JCC's, Leo Baeck Day School, the Koffler Centre of the Arts and Toronto and Ontario region of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. She is the incoming Vice-Chair of the Board of Hillel of Greater Toronto. Micki and her husband participated on the Fisher Flight program through JFNA. Micki is married to Sam and they have two children, Eden (7)and Ethan (5).

"I grew up in a family deeply connected and committed to our Jewish community. I am so grateful to have been taught that our responsibility to take care and strengthen our community is also a privilege, especially as a Canadian living in these times. I feel that the more involved I get in UJA Federation, the more involved I want to be. It has been incredible working with, learning from, and being inspired by the lay leaders and professionals who make UJA's work, holy work. Receiving this award is something very special to me, however I really share it with all of my friends with whom I work with to help make the vision we all want for our community come to life."

DARREN SUKONICK

"Start local and go global" has been one of Darren's mottos as his community and philanthropic endeavours developed over the years. Darren started on his community leadership journey canvassing on behalf of United Jewish Appeal. That led him to be Co-Chair of UJA's Ben Gurion Society in 2008-2009 and Co-Chair of the Vanguard Division in 2013-2014 and Chair of the Cabinet 2011-2013. Outside of UJA, Darren has been a board member of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum and one of three Toronto Co-Chairs, involved with raising funds and awareness for the Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

"Kol Yisrael arevim zehla-zeh". All Jews are responsible for one another. From the earliest chapters of the Bible we learn that we are, in fact, the keepers of our brothers and sisters. The notion of volunteering or donating suggests a transaction where the volunteer or donor gives to others. In my experience, the reverse actually occurs. When working within the community, I am the recipient of the greatest gift imaginable: the opportunity to perform mitzvot, to improve the world (even a little) and to share the amazing luck I have in being born at this time, in this place and in circumstances that allow me to give of my 'time, talent and treasure'. Fulfilling my responsibility to others enables me to feel not only closer to God but also a vibrant part of the dynamic tapestry of the Jewish people."

Gordy Wolfe Award for Jewish Communal Professional Leadership

This award honours the memory of Gordy Wolfe z"l, the consummate professional who served as Executive Director of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) for 22 years. The award recognizes a visionary professional communal leader who, like Gordy, has made a substantive difference in the life of Jewish Toronto

JANIS ROTH

Janis Roth is the Executive Director of JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto. She earned both her Bachelor and Master of Social Work from McGill University and has been working in the social service field within the Jewish community for over 33 years. Janis has received several awards for her academic achievements and work innovations. A native of Montreal, Janis moved to Toronto in 1997 with her husband and two daughters. She has been with JIAS Toronto for 10 years leading the agency through reorganization, change and growth. Janis developed the framework for JPAG and 1 Open Door, and her values of belonging, inclusion and a just society are embedded in all she does.

"I have been privileged at JIAS Toronto and throughout my career to build a life's work that reflects my personal values and brings meaning to others. Along the way, I have been most fortunate to work with creative, bright and caring professionals and volunteers; Gordy Wolfe z"l among them. To be recognized for work that I love to do and receive an award in Gordy's name for it is a gift I will always hold close."

Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence

This award, from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, recognizes the outstanding contribution made to the Foundation by professionals in our community. It recognizes the long-term impact of the contributions made by lawyers, accountants, estate planners and to the charitable organizations that reap the benefit of their efforts.

JORDAN CAPLAN

Jordan Caplan is an incorporated partner at Crowe Soberman LLP and serves as the firm's international liaison partner. Jordan has been a member of the Professional Advisory Committee for the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto for over five years, serving on several sub-committees during his tenure. He is a past speaker at PAC events, delivering presentations and case studies on topics like succession planning, estate administration and legacy gifting. He assists clients with their philanthropic endeavours by helping to structure their gifting to existing charities and non-profit groups or creating private charitable foundations and donor advised funds. Jordan served as Treasurer for the Canadian Association of Family Enterprise (CAFÉ) and currently sits on the Finance Committee and the Audit Committee at Oakdale Golf and Country Club.

"Serving the community is an integral factor of my professional career. I believe if you are fortunate to be in a position to do so, it is incumbent on you to help those in need. Giving back is the responsibility of each person who is capable of contributing his or her resources, talent or time. Knowing that I am striving to do my part in making my contributions to society, I am deeply humbled and honoured to be recognized by the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and to receive the 2014 PAC Award of Excellence."

Community Inclusion Award of Excellence

This award recognizes an outstanding volunteer within Toronto's Jewish community whose exceptional efforts has resulted in a more inclusive Jewish community for people with special needs. The award has been designed to bring the importance of physical and social inclusion to the attention of the entire Jewish community. The aim is to honour and recognize an outstanding individual who has embraced inclusion and had an impact on the lives of people with special needs.

KATHY LASZIO is the mother of a 27 year old son, who has autism. She is the Co-Founder and director of D.A.N.I. (Developing and Nurturing Independence) The goal of the organization is to create opportunities for Jewish young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges to participate fully as valued members of the community and to enjoy a meaningful and dignified quality of Jewish life. D.A.N.I. provides vocational/social/academic programs within the Jewish community. Kathy currently is the Director of Finance at DANI. She lives in Thornhill with her three children, Danny, Mikey and Sarah.

"It is a privilege to be part of a supportive community and make a difference in the lives of young adults, who have special needs. I am humbled by receiving UJA Federation's 2014 Community Inclusion Award of Excellence."

SUSIE SOKOL is a parent of five children, including two with challenges. She has been involved in the world of special needs for 30 years as a nurse, social worker, educator, an editor of a unique magazine, B'YADEINU, as well as created support circles around families, and designed mothers' encouragement groups. Strengthening professional and personal connections to Israel, Susie has researched and had involvement with programs and individuals there and other international organizations. She is also the Co-Founder of D.A.N.I., developing and nurturing independence, of adults with special needs, that now features a business and social enterprise and growing recreational programs.

"Our children are profoundly ordinary people sharing the same need to feel included, recognized and loved." (Adolf Ratzka)

"I feel privileged to have the opportunity to support and nurture these essential life lessons in our community."

Volunteer Excellence: Shem Tov Honourees

Shem Tov Awards are presented, in partnership with agencies, to leaders representing the highest level of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

RUTH ABRAHAMSON
JVS Toronto

Ruth Abrahamson is the CEO of Base Consulting and Management Inc., a consulting company in the association management sector. She is married to Lee Abrahamson; together they have three grown children. Ruth is immediate Past Chair of the Board of JVS Toronto. She served as the Vice-Chair of the Board and became the Chair of the Board in 2010 to 2012. Ruth served on Strategic Planning, Marketing, Jewish Community Initiative, Search, Governance, Nominating, Fundraising and Strictly Business Committees. JVS has been very fortunate to have a leader of her caliber who is never shy to roll up her sleeves to deliver on deadlines, do research, leverage her contacts and support JVS. Ruth is an advocate for JVS's staff, our clients and the community. This became evident in her role as Co-Chair of Strictly Business, JVS Toronto's annual fundraising event. Ruth has also served on the Board of the Toronto Convention and Visitor's Association, Meeting Professionals International Toronto Chapter, and Canadian Centre for Diversity.

"First introduced to JVS in the late 1990's, I felt an immediate connection with the practicality of the work of the agency in helping people to find employment and build careers and a similar connection to the staff and the leadership. I am still dazzled by the all-out dedication, innovation and creativity of the professional team at JVS. They and my fellow hard-working Board Members are my motivation for wanting to help and to do more. I have sat on many JVS committee and will continue to do so, but the most rewarding has been my time on the Board, helping to think strategically and plan for the future. The Shem Tov Award is a great honour, because it originates from my JVS colleagues. It is a true representation of collegiality and shared endeavours. My sincere thanks to JVS and to UJA for this recognition."

JULIE SCHWARTZ
Reena

Julie Schwartz holds an Honors Bachelor of Arts in American Civilization and a Masters degree in Counseling Psychology from the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. Since marrying Larry and moving to Canada in 1977, her professional activities have focused on marketing and advertising research. Currently semi-retired, Julie's career included running her own qualitative consumer research consultancy, as well as senior management positions with McCann Erickson and Ogilvy and Mather Advertising. As a proud dual citizen of both Canada and the United States, no matter the outcome, Julie can always claim victory when the Leafs play the Flyers. Julie's volunteer commitments include: board and executive member with OneFamily Fund Canada, as well as participation on each Cross Israel Hike in support of victims of terror in Israel, board member with REENA and REENA Foundation, as well as activities around the Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament in support of people with developmental challenges, Holy Blossom Temple Bikur Cholim and Special Education committee member, social enterprise pro bono business development advisor with Common Ground Co-op and A-WAY Courier Express. Julie loves to hike, swim, bike, write; and expand her horizons courtesy of participating in the U of T School of Continuing Studies.

"I am honored to be considered a SHEM TOV, and proud to share this award with all of the truly wonderful good names of those at REENA."

Recognizing Our Community Volunteers

DAVID SPIRO
Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA)

A dedicated UJA Federation volunteer for the last fifteen years, David is a past recipient of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Award as well as a National Young Leadership Award from Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA. He has received a Face to Face Canvasser Award and a Canvasser "Closer" Award from UJA Federation in recognition of his exemplary leadership in recent annual campaigns. David became the first Canadian to chair the National Young Leadership Cabinet of the Jewish Federations of North America and has served on the JFNA Board. He chaired the Committee on Public Affairs at UJA Federation before becoming the first chair of the GTA Local Partnership Council of CIJA. David currently serves on CIJA's Board of Directors and is a member of its Governance Committee. He was a Vice-Chair of the canvassing team for the 2013 JNF Negev Dinner honouring Prime Minister Harper.

"We are privileged to live in a city that leads the Jewish world in so many profound ways. Our community is incredibly strong, committed and inspired. If each of us does our part to provide for the future, together we will ensure the continued growth, success and leadership of our entire community."

LAWRENCE WILDER
Miles Nadal JCC

Lawrence Wilder is a partner at Cassels Brock and Blackwell LLP and has a securities practice that spans all manner of corporate finance, from private equity to initial public offerings to follow-on equity and debt financings. Lawrence Wilder was the Chair of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Board of Directors from 2010-2012. He has served on the Board of the Miles Nadal JCC since 2005 and is part of the new guard that brought the Miles Nadal JCC forward to its position of strength and commitment to the community today. He worked very closely with the emerging JCCs at the north campuses and participated in two JCCA biennial leadership conferences in 2010 and 2012. Through his leadership the Miles Nadal JCC has brought a greater focus to the Active 55+ group of Members and he set up and funded the Helen and Seymour Wilder Seniors Wellness Program honouring his parents. He is a genuine role model to other donors and Board Members, and the Miles Nadal JCC is the stronger for it.

"We are fortunate to live in Toronto, with its vibrant Jewish community. We truly have a 'Jewish Ecosystem', with excellent facilities and resources for every one of all walks of life and all ages. I volunteer to give back to the community that has given me and my family so much. I do this by volunteering my time with the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre for these past few years and seeing the wonderful work that it does to enhance the lives of our community members of all ages in the downtown Toronto area."

JUDY WINBERG
Jewish Family & Child

Judy Winberg, Immediate Past President of the Board of Directors of Jewish Family & Child has been an active volunteer and community leader for more than 39 years. Bringing a strong interest and commitment to Governance, Judy succeeded in strategically reconstituting the Agency's Board and committee structure to reflect more outcome-oriented, integrated thinking about service delivery. She enlivened Board meetings by inviting social workers to share client stories that brought great richness to discussions and deliberations. Judy actively participated in the opening of two Agency branches and played an important role as a sponsor and a member of the planning committee for JF&CS' first community wide fundraising event, Jewish Folks Telling Jokes. Judy is married to Jack Winberg and together they have three adult children, all of whom are active volunteer leaders in the Toronto Jewish community.

"Within our diverse community are fellow Jews who battle mental illness, live in assisted housing, receive financial support, suffer with substance abuse and experience domestic violence, child abuse and neglect. Jewish Family & Child is the agency that provides direct counselling services, social and educational programs, financial assistance, and when needed, child protection services. To serve as the President of the Board of Directors of Jewish Family & Child has been the highlight of my community leadership and a truly humbling experience."

Generosity

It's almost impossible for most of us to even imagine a Jewish holiday that did not include great food.

But the truth is, there are many Jews living in Toronto, Israel, Cuba and the Former Soviet Union (FSU) who simply can't afford even the most basic food staples for the holidays, especially Passover. With that thought in mind, UJA's annual Global Seder to Fight Hunger raises money to send kosher for Pesach food to Jews in need. And, as usual, Jewish Toronto's incredible cadre of volunteers rose to the occasion when UJA needed individuals to make calls during Sunday, March 30th Global Seder Telethon at the Lipa Green Centre on Sherman Campus. More than 220 enthusiastic individuals took to the phones and raised over $280,000.

Caring

More than 1,200 participate in Yom Hashoah

On Sunday, April 27th, 2014, more than 1200 people from across the GTA came together to remember the victims; honour the survivors, rescuers, and liberators; and pledge to never forget.

On Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, we commemorate the 6 million Jewish victims of National Socialism. Since 2003, Canada has recognized Yom Hashoah on a national level, and the ten Canadian provinces passed legislation making Holocaust Remembrance Day an official day on their provincial calendars.

Community Volunteers

Our Community Walks the Walk

As it has for more than four decades, United Jewish Appeal's annual Walk with Israel turned the streets of Toronto into a veritable sea of blue and white on Sunday, May 26th, as more than 16,000 individuals publically showed their love and support for the Jewish state. Chaired by Jamie and Lauren Wise, Micki and Sam Mizrahi, the Walk began with a kick-off party at Coronation Park, before walkers took to the streets.

Afterwards, participants made their way to the Direct Energy Centre on the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition for the Renee & Irwin Nadal Festival for great games, rides, and much more. Thanks to all those who came out and to our incredible volunteers. We simply couldn't have done it without you!

Enjoying Purim across the GTA!

On Sunday, March 16, 2013 more than 2,500 men, women and children celebrated Purim in style at the party of the year at York Region's Schwartz/Reisman Centre on UJA Federation's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus. With great music, balloons, face painting, a magic show, arts & crafts, and much, much, more, children – of all ages - had plenty of entertainment options. And, of course, what would Purim be without delicious hamentashen, served to all, along with other tasty treats.

But, fear not, as, if you were looking for another option, UJA Federation's other Jewish Community Centres – the Prosserman JCC on Sherman Campus at Bathurst and Sheppard, as well as the Miles Nadal JCC at Bloor and Spadina, offered families living in central Toronto and downtown equally festive and exciting Purim parties. So, no matter where you live, you could share the spirit of this fun and festive holiday with like-minded members of the community.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Recognizing Our Community Volunteers

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto expresses profound appreciation to the countless individuals who selflessly volunteer their time and talents through our many community agencies, schools, congregations and organizations. Through their efforts these dedicated men, women and young adults help build a more cohesive Jewish community which, in turn, preserves and strengthens the quality of Jewish life in Toronto, Canada and Israel. The willingness of Toronto's Jewish community to volunteer and help one another makes it a model community – one emulated throughout North America.

A Canadian marriage proposal, and a crooner at the Kotel

Like Birthright, only with social media

A day prior to his sold-out show before 46,000 fans at Tel Aviv's Yarkon Park, pop superstar Justin Timberlake's first act upon landing in Israel was to head to the Kotel to pray, a moment he captured in a photo that he posted on – where else – Instagram. Timberlake avoided most of the paparazzi, landing at 3 a.m. on May 27 and heading straight to the wall with his wife, actress Jessica Biel, and his parents. "The Holy Land… What an experience. I will never forget this day. #Israel," he tweeted.

Justin Timberlake's Western Wall moment

Would you like a cruller with that?

It doesn't get much more Canadian than a marriage proposal at Tim Hortons – and at a drive-thru no less – which is what happened May 22 when marketer Jared Gaber, 28, popped the question to his girlfriend of one year, divorce lawyer Stephanie Pasternak, as she pulled in to get her morning caffeine hit. Gaber arranged his sugary sweet stunt ahead of time with Tim Hortons' head office and had a friend record the whole thing for posterity, as well as the requisite YouTube posting, which has garnered more than 165,000 views and tons of free publicity for the chain. "You are the first woman I ever fell in love with, and the last woman I ever want to be in love with. Will you spend the rest of your life with me?" he asked through the North York, Ont., outlet's drive-thru window. A blushing Pasternak said yes, then climbed out of her car window to kiss her new fiancé.

Man U, Bucs owner dies

American billionaire Malcolm Glazer, owner of the NFL's Tampa Bay Buccaneers and British Premier League soccer club Manchester United, died May 28 at 85. He had been in failing health after suffering two strokes since 2006. One of seven children born to Lithuanian Jewish immigrants, Glazer purchased the Bucs in 1995 for a then-NFL record of $192 million. Its value has more than quadrupled, and he's widely credited with turning around the sad-sack franchise, which won its only Super Bowl in 2002. He finished acquiring Man U in 2005 for $1.2 billion.

Healthy dose of controversy

"What is the point?" asks Ruth Sacher, about The CJN dishing dirt on COR and kashrut ("Fanning the flames," The CJN, May 29).

The point is this: scandal in a newspaper is an indicator of a healthy, democratic press. When articles are kept clean, we ask what other news is being kept from us? Who is doing the censoring? And if scandal is fuel for the anti-Semites, so be it. Do we cut off our noses because anti-Semites don't like them?

My Promised Land challenges

I agree with Martin Goldfarb's commentary about Ari Shavit's My Promised Land ("The challenge of My Promised Land," The CJN, May 15).

I would add my own comments as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst. Shavit reveals to us in his first paragraph that he was traumatized in his early years, asking on the eve of the 1967 war and again in 1973 on the eve of the Yom Kippur War if the Arabs would throw Israel into the sea.

His book is well written with more of an empathic ear to the Arab "tragedy" than to his own Jewish Israeli brethren. The praise he receives for his writing is justified, but his conclusion betrays the Zionism of his great-grandfather Herbert Bentwich and would turn him in his Jewish grave.

Hire workers with disabilities

I'd like to commend you on your series on inclusion of people with disabilities ("The Inclusion Project," The CJN, May 22). As a parent of a young woman with autism and as a board member of Reena, I am aware of how the Jewish community has been slow to accept and include people with disabilities.

Just a few years ago, when my daughter was younger, I could not find a Jewish camp that would accept her in the Toronto area and had to go to B'nai Brith Montreal for her to have a Jewish camp experience. The YMCA was also far more welcoming than the Jewish camps.

It would be wonderful if business owners could be encouraged to employ people with disabilities. They will prove to be dedicated and dependable employees who will stay on the job.

There are companies hiring people with disabilities who have found it profitable, and there are good business reasons for such hires. Walgreens in the United States, Specialisterne in Denmark, a Tim Hortons franchise operator and London Drugs here in Canada make a good business case for hiring disabled workers. There are also companies formed specifically to provide work for people with disabilities, such as Common Ground Catering and Good Foot Courier Services here in Toronto.

Kiddush counts

I'm so glad to hear rabbis Adam Cutler and Adam Scheier recognize the importance of hosting and greeting individuals at kiddush ("Shul kiddush is about more than food," The CJN, May 15).

If every person attending was mindful of a stranger in their midst and just said "Shabbat shalom," it could make a world of difference in a return visit to shul.

Debbie Bauer

From the campaign trail

While campaigning to become the next MPP for York Centre, I'm often asked why I decided to run for office. In short, it's because of the strong sense of community that my parents instilled in me at a very young age.

Before immigrating to Canada from Ukraine, my parents struggled to maintain their Jewish identity under an oppressive Soviet regime, but they persevered through community engagement, mutual collaboration and hard work. These are the values that have served as guiding principles in my life.

Born and raised in York Centre, I know it is an amazing place for families to grow and prosper. Our community has been neglected for far too long and our economy, jobs and home life are suffering as a result. If given the opportunity, I will work hard to facilitate the change that needs to happen so our community can once again flourish.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

Google can't answer our larger, existential questions. The challenge is how to use new media to convey an eternal message.

Rabbi N.Daniel Korobkin
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: Last time, we spoke about the Pew Report and intermarriage. But there are other findings from the report that are even more important. Fewer Jews are choosing to connect with synagogues. We are no longer living in an age in which people are looking to belong to religious institutions, or to see their Jewish identity as involving religion.

Rabbi Korobkin: You contextualized the issue of Jewish identity and religion as being connected with synagogue affiliation. While the two are definitely connected, I think synagogue affiliation is tangential to the larger issue: Jews, like all westerners, are dropping out of organized religion entirely in droves. We are living in a digital age when everything is being broken down into bytes and bits. Our youth are so busy texting and tweeting that they don't have time to ruminate over the larger issues and see if what they're reading online actually answers the bigger questions. Today, people have failed to see that religion doesn't compete with science and technology, but rather answers those larger questions that science and technology cannot.
I can only hope that with time, many of this generation will begin to start seeing these larger questions cannot be answered by Google. If we can solve that problem, we won't have to worry about the future of our synagogues.

Rabbi Grushcow: I agree that the issue of synagogue membership is tangential to the bigger question of how engaged people are with religion. That being said, I think people do continue to ask the eternal, existential questions.
There is no doubt that the Internet can provide quick answers, but not often deep ones. If you use your iPhone to ask Siri the meaning of life, you won't get a substantive response.
Every age uses its own media and its own language. For me, the question is: how do we use the medium to convey the message? Given that we live in the world of Google, how can we use search engines as entry points to a much more substantive search? And how do we recognize that sometimes, people turn to virtual communities because they feel like actual communities have failed them?

Rabbi Korobkin: You're spot on in your assessment of the human need for a deeper connection to existential truths, and that's where the human contact of clergy and community play a vital role. The challenge, as you say, is how to attract young people to the resources that we as a faith community are seeking to provide. I'm sure that your congregation has a Facebook page and is engaged in various social media, as is ours. But I'm still seeing too many people in my very Jewish neighbourhood of Thornhill, Ont., slipping between the cracks, either apathetic or oblivious to our offerings, or simply too bombarded by all the other "chatter" in their lives to pay attention to the gifts of Judaism that are theirs for the taking. But that doesn't stop us from consistently experimenting with new ideas to get the word out. We're also trying to present a larger "community" identity by encouraging our members to participate in more community- and Federation-sponsored events. We want people to see that we're truly "team" players, and not just worried about Orthodox concerns.

Rabbi Grushcow: There is a wonderful book called Hamlet's Blackberry by William Powers, in which the author argues that many eras have faced new technologies that have challenged reflectiveness and thoughtful living. Our response cannot be to be Luddites. Rather, we need to find ways to carve out sacred time and sacred space. In this, synagogue life and Jewish teachings have a lot to offer. Just having a synagogue Facebook account won't cut it.

Rabbi Korobkin: If we've been around this long, nothing, not even the Internet, is going to stop us! It never ceases to amaze me how, despite all the distractions of the modern world, so many Jews still see the synagogue and Judaism as a "sanctuary," a place of escape from this overly physical world, and a stairway to Heaven. Our job, yours and mine, is to embrace every single person with unconditional love and acceptance, and help them carve a holy space in their lives. ■

Shavuot's reminder: we're in this together

The notion of mass revelation at Sinai, the event we commemorate this week on Shavuot, is undeniably dramatic. The Talmud teaches all Jews – past, present and future – were there, quaking at the base of the mountain together, but no matter whether you consider Matan Torah a historical event or a metaphor, the image retains significance: A unified nation, a people born together. On Shavuot, we contemplate our Jewish connection.

The corollary of mass revelation is kol yisrael arevim ze lazeh, the principle that every Jew is responsible for the well-being of every other Jew. And if you're looking for an example of kol yisrael arevim ze lazeh at work, you couldn't do better than the story of George Meltz, as told in this week's CJN by Ellin Bessner.

Bombardier Meltz, a Toronto native, landed in Normandy on June 6, 1944 – D-Day. He died in battle and was buried at the Beny-sur-Mer war cemetery, the Magen David etched into his tombstone standing out among the rows upon rows of crosses, along with the moving epitaph penned by his mysterious widow: "He died so Jewry shall suffer no more."

Bessner is among a group paying tribute to the nearly 70 Jewish Canadians who died while serving in the Canadian Forces in France during World War II with a campaign called "#KaddishforDDay." It's based on a project undertaken by the Jewish community of France to say Kaddish on June 8 for all Allied Jewish servicemen who died in that country during the war. In essence, both efforts suggest kol yisrael arevim zeh lazeh is a living concept: George Meltz and his compatriots served us. Now, we honour them.

But there is another side to kol yisrael arevim zeh lazeh. It is equally a reminder to stand together when Judaism is endangered or injured. Thus, our vigilance when anti-Semitism threatens us – and, as Canada's score in the Anti-Defamation League's recent index of anti-Semitism confirms, the vast majority of Canadians understand Jews aren't the enemy.

But there are times when the hazard develops from within. Columnist Rabbi Dow Marmur argues, also in this week's CJN, the rise of so-called "price-tag" incidents, in which Israeli youth deface property – including religious institutions – belonging to Muslims and Christians, is a case in point.

"This should concern us all," Rabbi Marmur writes of what he calls a "manifestation of Jewish terrorism." And as the frequency of price-tag incidents trends upward, he argues the need to act has never been more urgent, concluding: "Our voices must be heard not only because we ourselves have been victims of such harassment as preludes to worse things, but also because these acts, ostensibly committed in the name of Judaism, fly in the face of the very basis of our faith and tradition."

The Sinai revelation is often referred to as a marriage between the Jewish People and God. Whatever that means to you, there remains a fundamental bond that ties us back to Sinai. Shavuot reminds us of the union we formed there, and that kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh represents its continuous manifestation. It applies always, for better and for worse. ■ — YONI

George Meltz: just one of 17,000 D-Day heroes

Sacrifices of Canadian Jewish soldiers to be recalled on June 6

ELLIN BESSNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Seventy years ago this week, a Toronto wallpaper salesman and truck driver, George Meltz, took part in the D-Day landings in Normandy.

Meltz, 25, was one of at least 70 Canadian Jewish servicemen killed in France during World War II who are buried in cemeteries there.

Meltz was the youngest of 10 children when he enlisted in Toronto in 1941. His family says a sniper killed him. According to niece Isabella Meltz, who lives in Toronto, "like most of his Jewish working-class peers, he enlisted quickly. My uncle married while posted in England, but the couple had less than a year together."

Meltz's tombstone in the Beny-sur-Mer war cemetery has a Star of David on it, and the powerful epitaph by his widow: "He died so Jewry shall suffer no more."

Now Meltz's name, and the names of nearly 70 other Canadian Jewish servicemen who also sacrificed their lives in France in World War II, won't be forgotten, at least for this week.

On June 8, the French Jewish community in Paris is organizing a special D-Day memorial service in Normandy.

Jean-Max Skenadji, the Paris-based promoter for the official French Jewish federation, known as CRIF, originally planned to honour only the 150 American Jewish servicemen buried at Colleville-Sur-Mer, near Omaha Beach, the site of the American D-Day landings.

"What would have become of us without the landing of the Allies on June 6?" the CRIF statement asks.

Some 17,000 Canadian Jews served in the Canadian forces during the war, which Historica Canada says was more then "one-fifth of the entire Jewish male population."

I emailed Skenadji in Paris, and asked him to consider including our Canadians. He replied, "Yes," immediately. He's already invited Canada's ambassador to France, Lawrence Cannon.

Among the other names the organizers will read out are Toronto's Fred B. Harris, who was a close friend of the late Col. Barney Danson, and who never even made it onto the beach; Montreal's Fred Pascal, a son of the Pascal hardware family; and Meyer Schwartz from Windsor, who is buried in the same grave together with his gentile co-pilot.

George Meltz

Each of these soldiers and airmen has an incredible story. There's the lawyer, the Yiddish poet, the dentist, the doctors, and the 17-year-old, Frank Silverberg, who was sent back home to Toronto twice – each time the army had discovered he was too young to enlist.

Now I'm asking all Canadian Jews to remember these liberators, too, by participating in #KaddishForDDay.

It's an opportunity to honour the sacrifices of these Jewish men who fought for Canada and for freedom, their graves mostly unvisited.

Already, several synagogues in Canada have taken up the challenge of #KaddishforDDay, including Vaughan's Beit Rayim Synagogue.

According to Rabbi Chezi Zionce, when Jews say Yizkor, it is repeated for each individual neshamah, each soul. He will read each soldier's name during Yizkor services on Shavuot, June 5.

"It's about time," Rabbi Zionce said of the long overdue D-Day prayers, noting that Israel marks Yom Hazikaron every year for the fallen soldiers and victims of terror. "We Jews put a great deal of emphasis on remembering, and this can serve as a poignant reminder to a new generation who are sometimes unaware of the sacrifices that their grandparents and relatives made on behalf of freedom and for this wonderful country we live in."

In Montreal, Congregation Dorshei Emet will mark #KaddishforDDay on June 7.

"The command to remember, zakhor, is central to Jewish tradition, as is the value of gratitude, hakarat hatov," said Rabbi Ron Aigen. "We can only hope that this new tradition of #KaddishforDDay will give contemporary meaning to our ancient values."

Meltz's niece, Isabella is grateful to know that her late uncle's wartime story will not be forgotten.

"You think about it, as you get older, and how you do things through the generations and it's going to get lost," she said.

We need a better way to debate our problems

Avrum Rosensweig

The CJN's recent foray into intense investigative reporting about the Kashruth Council of Canada, known as COR, is a journalistic departure and a game changer for the community. I don't remember a series of this nature, one in which an organization, its competition and some major industry players have been talked about so openly.

As this newspaper pursues a new course, the inevitable question is whether it's a healthy one that enhances the transparency of our community or an unhealthy change that encourages lashon hara – "bad talk" – in a world rife with public condemnation and gotcha journalism.

The Toronto Jewish community still maintains some of its shtetl-like character. Our population, services and organizations are growing, but many Jews up and down the Bathurst Street corridor continue to harbour some of the old time zol zein shtil sentiment – don't let the goyim hear. The remnant of this small-town mentality means our community frequently deals with issues the way our grandparents used to, by pretending they're not there and allowing them to fester, even though a problem could be causing much harm.

A case in point is COR. Many community workers and eatery owners will tell you there have been whispers behind closed doors for years about COR, including complaints about how much it charges restaurants for supervision and its growing stridency regarding the rules of kashrut.

Some will tell you privately that COR hasn't protected consumers as the cost of kosher food – particularly for Passover – has risen. Some also maintain that COR has few checks and balances in place to ensure transparency and has acted as a monopoly with virtually no competition.

The recent CJN series covered these topics with the goal of outing the zol zein shtil dialogue and challenging COR and the community to partake in an open discussion about the Toronto community's largest kashrut supervisory agency. COR didn't respond to requests for interviews, but instead posted its position on its website (cor.ca), a move somewhat reflective of the old attitude.

So what could be wrong with a CJN series that encourages introspection in such a public manner?

Here's the challenge: the CJN series doesn't limit its exposé to names of organizations, but in fact included references to individuals who are key to COR operations, as well as quotes from Badatz, its competition, and others. This is a traditional and standard journalistic approach used widely around the world, essentially pitting two or more people or organizations against one another in an attempt to create a widely read debate or examination of an issue at hand.

While this approach can be very effective, it has also played a key role in misrepresenting many individuals and their positions, and has encouraged people-bashing or lashon hara. We see this in Canada's mainstream media all the time. An extreme example would be waking up to a front-page picture of an investment banker who might have absconded with clients' money. Months later, that person may be found entirely innocent, yet the image sticks in our minds.

Furthermore, until now, our community has kept certain topics out of the public sphere, thereby maintaining peace within our ranks. While the quiet simmering of certain issues has cost us, one could argue it has also maintained a sense of unity, kind of like when our parents left the room to argue.

So what should we do? Do we applaud the newest iteration of The CJN for publicly helping to repair a perceived wrong, or do we challenge the new brass by saying, "Upsetting the peace is just not worth it"?

Either way, the Toronto Jewish community needs an alternative form of problem-solving so that hot, and even scalding, issues are dealt with in a more open and vigorous manner through such things as regular town-hall meetings and alternative forms of justice.

The COR series has definitely made that clear. ■

A museum whose time has come

Bernie Farber

It was to have been the very last time that a world gone mad would permit the attempted genocide of a people. For Jews it became known as the Holocaust, or in Hebrew, the Shoah. For the Roma, another group persecuted by the Nazis, it was called the Porajmos, or the Devouring.

To be sure, it wasn't the first time in human history when such evil walked the earth. Only a generation before the Nazis, Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin attempted to rid the U.S.S.R. of a portion of the Ukrainian population by instigating a man-made famine known as the Holodomor.

Earlier in the 20th century, the Turks, trying to find ways to deal with their rebellious Armenian population, slaughtered more than one million men, women and children. Known as the Meds Yahearn, it was to this genocide that Adolf Hitler, in preparing his own plans to murder the Jews of Europe, famously referred when he asked his leadership, "Who remembers the Armenians?"

So out of the ashes of the Holocaust, after Hitler's barbarians managed to murder almost two-thirds of European Jewry and just as many Roma, the cry "Never again" was repeated and almost believed.

And yes, immediately following the war, with war crimes trials in full swing, with the United Nations developing international law against genocide, humanity took a break from such evil.

Sadly, evil never leaves us. It may remain dormant for a while, but like a virus, it needs only to find a willing host to spread its poison yet again.

It didn't take long. Barely 20 years later, as we entered the 1960s, mass murder was once again in vogue. As the Vietnam War dragged on, it provided a shield for Cambodia's brutal dictator, Pol Pot, to slaughter almost two million of his people. Buried in mass burial sites known as the "Killing Fields," Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge seemed to have forgotten "Never again."

And let's not forget the wanton slaughter of up to 1.5 million Bangladeshis by the Pakistani army. And of course Mao Zedong was responsible for countless millions of Chinese deaths during his rule.

More recently, Rwandan Hutus hacked to death close to 1.5 million Tutsis and moderate Hutus. And in the last decade, Sudan's brutal Janjaweed have been responsible for the mass murder of countless Darfurians.

In Canada, many historians are taking a closer look at whether or not we committed genocide against our First Nations.

Indeed, "Never again" seems to have become "Again and again."

To teach necessary and valuable lessons, the late Izzy Asper, Jewish philanthropist and former leader of the Liberal party of Manitoba, came up with a way to truly understand and memorialize human rights and wrongs.

Situated in Winnipeg and set to open next fall, Asper's dream, the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, will be a place where the next generation can learn and visualize a future that will speak forthrightly of genocide, discrimination and even Canada's own human rights record, good and bad, while heralding human rights heroes.

With $20 million from his own foundation, this was to be a private-public partnership. And while Asper didn't live to see his dream fulfilled, his daughter, Gail, has unwaveringly taken over the reins.

It hasn't been without its difficulties, including victimized groups vying for limited space and arguments about the extent of one genocide over another. Yet despite these issues, Gail Asper moves boldly forward. As she told me, "We can't be complacent, we can't rest while anyone's rights are under attack, and we all need to take personal responsibility for the preservation and enhancement of human rights in Canada and around the world".

Sadly, today, human rights are under attack from those who believe protecting them stifles freedom. Can anything be further from the truth? Thankfully, with visionaries such as Gail Asper, Canada can become a focal point for understanding humanity through a museum whose time has come. ■

We must all speak out against Jewish terror

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Fanatics are eerily similar, irrespective of which side they're on. Thus Jews in Europe and elsewhere who've experienced the daubing of synagogues and vandalism of Jewish property relive their nightmares these days when Jewish extremists in Israel deface mosques and churches, destroy olive trees and slash tires of cars that belong to Arabs. In their zeal, they even attack Israeli army posts.

In the graffiti they leave behind, they justify their crimes as tag mechir (price tag). They want us to believe their vandalism is the legitimate price to be paid for real or imagined curbs on Jewish expansion in the West Bank and east Jerusalem.

Some are equal opportunity offenders. The recent daubings of a Reform synagogue in Ra'anana and the centre for Conservative Judaism in Jerusalem are of the same ilk.

Many perpetrators are said to come from the settlements. Their spray-painted messages include, "Death to the Arabs" and "Kahane was right."

Meir Kahane was a rabbi in the United States before coming to Israel to form the Kach party, which closely resembled fascist groups in other countries. He gained a seat in the Knesset, but the government banned him in 1988 as racist and anti-democratic. Two years later, he was assassinated by an Arab gunman in New York. His ghost lives on.

As reported recently in this paper, unlike fellow travellers in Israel and abroad, responsible Israeli politicians have publicly condemned the attacks. Defence Minister Moshe Ya'lon said that "a state that must fight with an iron fist against the terror which is wrongly called 'price tag' – an ugly phenomenon that has no connection to Jewish values and morals, and whose aim is to harm Arabs only because they are Arabs."

Justice Minister Tzipi Livni added that Israel must erect a "strong public and political Zionist fence" against all who seek to torpedo a peace deal with the Palestinians and thus hurt Israel's image abroad.

But Carmi Gillon, the mayor of Mevasseret Zion and a former head of Israel's internal security organization (Shin Bet), pointed to the original seeming reluctance by law enforcement agencies in Israel to apprehend the culprits.

In a similar vein, the U.S. State Department has said Israel hasn't adequately prosecuted the perpetrators. Echoing this, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the representative body of American Jewry, sent a message to Israeli security agencies urging them to take the necessary steps to uproot the activities of Jewish terrorists.

Cabinet minister Gilad Erdan, whose portfolio includes internal security and who is known for having close ties to the settler movement, originally rejected Gillon's assessment. Later, however, likely in deference to public opinion, it was announced that his department would seek to curb Jewish as well as Arab violence. Since then, some arrests have been made.

As there's nowadays no representative body of Canadian Jewry, it's up to individuals and organizations that care about Israel to endorse initiatives that condemn every manifestation of Jewish terrorism. We can do so by showing tangible support for the coalition of human rights organizations in Israel, Tag Meir (Light Tag), that exposes Jewish terror, demanding swift and decisive action by the authorities. One of the coalition members, Rabbi Ron Kronish, head of the Interreligious Co-ordinating Council in Israel, has written that "if it were the other way – Palestinians vandalizing synagogues and Jewish institutions – the culprits would be apprehended the same day." He warned against "moral duplicity." He and other interfaith activists were particularly worried about possible attacks on the Pope during his recent visit to Israel.

This should concern us all. Our voices must be heard not only because we ourselves have been victims of such harassment as preludes to worse things, but also because these acts, ostensibly committed in the name of Judaism, fly in the face of the very basis of our faith and tradition. They undermine the foundations on which Israel has been built. ■

Uniting behind human rights

Sheryl Saperia

Last month, Canada's Parliament displayed rare unity. Iran Accountability Week, which was co-sponsored by MPs James Bezan (Conservative), Irwin Cotler (Liberal) and Paul Dewar (NDP), sought to highlight the threat emanating from Iran's military-nuclear program, terrorist sponsorship, incitement to genocide, and human rights violations. Members of all parties conveyed their concerns about the Iranian regime.

Canada's response to Iran's illicit nuclear conduct has been notable. Notwithstanding the absence of secondary sanctions (meaning non-Canadians are free to do business with Iran without penalty), the sanctions are considered fairly comprehensive. Imports from and exports to Iran are prohibited, with limited exemptions.

Yet David Albright, a physicist who founded the Institute for Science and International Security (ISIS) in Washington, D.C., recently released a report that notes "the widespread suspicion that Iran exploits Canada as a source of sanctioned goods." Albright further asserts that "Canada's export control efforts and laws against sanctioned countries such as Iran are rudimentarily enforced at best."

Even if the government addresses these serious claims immediately, it is increasingly possible that international nuclear-related sanctions against Iran will crumble as a result of the Obama administration's attempts to reach a deal – any deal – with Tehran.

Given Iran's progress in rehabilitating its economy under the shield of nuclear talks, it's imperative that its status as a preeminent violator of human rights not fall victim to this process. The Iranian regime is surprisingly sensitive to criticism about its domestic repression, and the desire to be reintegrated into the international community could make Tehran particularly vulnerable at this time.

Ahmed Shaheed, the UN's Special Rapporteur on human rights in Iran, maintains that an international spotlight "can act as a boon to those seeking positive change and a spur for transforming words into action." He recommends that every state "keep urging that steps be taken to strengthen the promotion and protection of human rights."

From a Canadian political perspective, the Iranian human rights file is one of those rare cases where principle trumps partisanship. All federal parties take umbrage at a regime that has the highest per capita rate of executions; imprisons more journalists and bloggers than any other country; targets religious and ethnic minorities; criminalizes fundamental freedoms of speech and association; and locks up opposition leaders and human rights defenders.

Canada should, therefore, consider imposing sanctions on the Iranian regime for its domestic repression. One option is to designate specific individuals or entities as human rights abusers under the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA). SEMA has already been used to penalize the governments of Syria, Zimbabwe, and Burma for their human rights abuses. The Iranian regime's violations are no less serious, and meet the criteria for usage of the legislation.

Targeted individuals could include the Supreme Leader of Iran; the president of Iran; key officials within the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) or even the entire entity, as well as leaders of the Basij, the Ministry of Intelligence and Security, and others. The new restrictions could be similar to those prescribed by existing nuclear sanctions under SEMA, or be amended as needed.

Opponents claim that with a nuclear deal in the works, it's not the right time to challenge the Iranian regime on its human rights record. But the two are in fact connected. Iran's nuclear program would be more effectively monitored in a freer and more transparent environment. Furthermore, the linkage is not without precedent. Western negotiators successfully linked arms control agreements with the Soviet Union to demands for Moscow's adherence to human rights under the 1975 Helsinki Accords.

Ottawa should take a lead role in urging a similar arrangement regarding Iran. Canadian parliamentarians have shown themselves capable of uniting behind a common message of compassion for the Iranian people. The sentiments expressed by MPs during Iran Accountability Week must now be translated into concrete action. ■

CIJA meets with Tutu, slams his views

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Though known for his censorious statements about Israel's treatment of the Palestinians and his vocal support for the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, human rights activist and retired Archbishop Desmond Tutu met May 27 in Toronto with a delegation from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

The archbishop was in Canada to attend an international gathering of the Order of St. John, of which St. John Ambulance is a service organization, and met privately with Shimon Fogel, CIJA's chief executive officer, along with CIJA chair David Koschitzky, board member Berl Nadler, philanthropist Michael Dan and former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, Bernie Farber, for about 40 minutes in his suite at the King Edward Hotel.

A Nobel laureate and the first black archbishop of Cape Town, the archbishop rose to renown in the 1980s for his ardent criticism of the South African government's treatment of blacks and his encouragement of non-violent measures of protest, including boycott and divestment. He has been widely disparaged within the Jewish community for likening Israel to apartheid-era South Africa and for endorsing international boycotts against it.

Fogel stressed that CIJA, part of whose mandate is to build relationships with other faith communities, did not initiate the meeting, but when approached by the Order with a request to meet with Archbishop Tutu, "felt there might be some value in sharing our perspective with him... an opportunity to speak directly and forthrightly about the extent to which [his] statements [about Israel] are misguided, hurtful and offensive."

> We characterized his views as deeply hurtful and harmful to the one state in the region in which the Christian community can practise their faith free of the kind of intimidation, threats and persecution that exist elsewhere
> Shimon Fogel
> CIJA

He said the meeting focused exclusively on the Arab-Israeli conflict and gave CIJA the chance to express its dismay at Tutu's articulation of anti-Israel views over the years.

"We characterized his views as deeply hurtful and harmful to the one state in the region in which the Christian community can practise their faith free of the kind of intimidation, threats and persecution that exist elsewhere."

The archbishop was, according to Fogel, "entirely unrepentant and unapologetic," showing no willingness to amend his position.

"He was not accepting of the suggestion that [these views] would benefit from additional considerations, for example... that Israel's legitimate security concerns gave rise to checkpoints, the security barrier and the like."

Farber stressed that the meeting was, nonetheless, an important opportunity for the Jewish community to convey its beliefs to Archbishop Tutu. He said that "this was done with focus and elegance, with no stone left unturned in terms of trying to make our point."

He emphasized the archbishop's views do not in any way represent the opinions of the Order of St. John, which is an apolitical organization supported by Jewish communities worldwide.

While CIJA decided to open a dialogue with Archbishop Tutu, B'nai Brith Canada issued a press release stating that it would not be seeking a meeting with him, given his "hateful statements about the Jewish People" and comparisons of the State of Israel to apartheid South Africa.

B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant said his organization was not approached about meeting with Archbishop Tutu, but that "anyone who has the kind of opinions [he] has vis-à-vis the State of Israel is not someone we want to engage in conversation, nor would our grassroots Jewish supporters be in favour of us meeting with him."

But he made it clear that B'nai Brith is not condemning CIJA's decision.

Last year, B'nai Brith and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – with whom CIJA is linked as the advocacy arm of the Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA – signed an agreement pledging to strengthen their ties and work together.

"I clearly state that [CIJA] had every right to meet [Archbishop Tutu]," Dimant said.

"By all means. We're not saying anything disparaging about their having met with him. We're just saying that we chose, in representing our constituency, not to meet with him."■

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

The Centre for Israel & Jewish Affairs

It's hard to believe that May, Jewish Heritage Month across Ontario, has come and gone so quickly. But, that's what happens when there are so many wonderful and inspiring Jewish events and programs taking place across the province, all of which proudly celebrate the many achievements and contributions made by members of the Jewish community.

Thank you to the participating organizations, and to all of you – the members of Jewish Toronto – for making Jewish Heritage Month 2014, which culminated with a record crowd of 20,000 participating in UJA's Walk with Israel, an unprecedented success!

Torah stops in city on way to Reform shul in Israel

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A Torah scroll that will soon head to a growing Reform community in Israel stopped in Toronto last week, as part of a 20-city tour across North America.

The Torateinu ARZA is on its way to Sha'ar HaNegev, a community in Israel with a new synagogue but no permanent Torah.

The scroll is connecting different Jewish communities across North America, and encouraging them to do something active and supportive for their Reform brethren in Israel, said Les Rothschild, president of ARZA Canada, the Association of Reform Zionists of America.

"We're doing this to support the ideals that the Reform movement has with Israel," said Rothschild. "Zionism for Reform Jews, in many cases, [means a] state that is pluralistic, that is egalitarian, that treats all citizens equally."

The Torateinu ARZA has been moving among Reform communities in cities across the United States since February, ahead of its flight to Israel at the end of June for Rosh Chodesh Tammuz.

The project started with the Beth Israel congregation in San Diego, Calif., which is a regional partner with Sha'ar HaNegev. Through its journey, the Torah has stopped in more than a dozen cities, including San Francisco, Seattle, New York and Boston. Toronto was the scroll's only Canadian stop.

On the left with the Torah scroll is Rabbi Noam Katz, the Dean of Jewish Living at The Leo Baeck Day School. On the right is Les Rothschild, the president of ARZA Canada. In front are grade 2 students from Leo Baeck's South Campus.

While in Toronto, Grade 2 students at both Leo Baeck Day School campuses did a hakafah with the scroll during their Torah ceremony. On Shabbat, members of Temple Sinai and City Shul congregations read from the Torah.

"We're recognizing that a Torah isn't something that sits in a museum or is sort of like an artifact," said Rabbi Stephen Wise, the leader of Shaarei Beth El, a Reform congregation in Oakville, Ont. "It's a real, living thing."

Sha'ar HaNegev is a mainly secular district with 10 kibbutzim. Located in the northern Negev desert, Sha'ar HaNegev is under the threat of rocket attacks from the nearby Gaza Strip. Over the past few years, Reform Jews there have borrowed a Torah from other congregations.

There are more than 40 Reform congregations in Israel, Rothschild said, and that number keeps growing.

When the Torateinu ARZA arrives in Israel at the end of June, it will not go directly to the Sha'ar HaNegev community. First, the Women of the Wall will read from the scroll on Rosh Chodesh Tammuz, at the Western Wall.

The members of Women of the Wall have prayed there together for 25 years, raising awareness about religious freedom in Israel. Women are currently not allowed to read from the Torah at the Wall. On that morning, three 12-year-old girls are to read from the Torateinu ARZA in honour of their bat mitzvahs. ■

Sharoni Sibony talks to visitors to First Narayever Congregation about the history of the shul during Doors Open Toronto. C. DAVID WEYMAN PHOTO

First Narayever takes part in Doors Open Toronto

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

More than 200 people toured First Narayever Congregation in the Annex on a recent Sunday during Doors Open Toronto, an annual event in which over 150 historically, culturally and socially significant buildings in Toronto are open to the public.

While viewing an exhibit that documents the congregation's history, visitor Kim Pokorn said that she had often walked past First Narayever on Brunswick Avenue without realizing that it's a synagogue.

Pokorn, who's Chinese, said "there's a similarity between Chinese people and European Jews." Noting that European Jews fled to Shanghai during the Holocaust era, she explained that she knows what it feels like to be unwelcome by a larger community. Pokorn is from Malaysia, where she said the Chinese community experienced discrimination.

First Narayever's rabbi, Ed Elkin, said that the shul participates in Doors Open – which it has done since 2012 – because "we consider ourselves part of a wider community and want to be integrated into that as much as we can. People pass by and they want to come in and don't know if they can, and this provides an opportunity."

He added that this year the congregation was particularly excited about Doors Open because it's First Narayever's 100th anniversary. "We're feeling pride of community and we're interested in sharing it."

For its centennial, congregation member Sharoni Sibony did some research on the synagogue's 13 founders. She pored over archival documents, read minutes of shul meetings, conducted oral history interviews and did genealogical research. "We didn't know who these people were," she said.

Sibony spoke to a steady stream of visitors on Doors Open day about the shul's first president, Israel Chaim Katz. Like the other First Narayever founders, Katz was from the town of Narayev, in Galicia, now Ukraine. A ship's manifest shows that in 1897, when he was 24, he sailed from Amsterdam to New York. Other records show that he married in 1901 and that his wife and six children moved to Toronto in 1913. "I assume he preceded her," Sibony said.

Katz and the other founders started the congregation in St. John's Ward in 1914. The ward was a notorious slum area in downtown Toronto where successive waves of immigrants settled in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. First Narayever's founders hoped to create a mutual benefit society, but with the Ontario government laws at the time, it was easier to establish a congregation.

Katz died in 1920 and was buried in another congregation's section in the Roselawn Avenue Cemetery, instead of in the Dawes Road Cemetery, where First Narayever has a section. Sibony said Katz may also have been part of another congregation that included other members from Galicia.

The First Narayever Congregation was itinerant until 1943, when it purchased and renovated its current home, the building at 187 Brunswick Ave., which had been a Mennonite church. In the 1950s and 1960s, as Jews moved northward,

Charity fashion show raises over $55,000

EDEN MITELMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

BAC2Fashion's sixth annual charity fashion show explored Toronto's fashion heritage last week while benefiting Toronto seniors at the same time.

The May 28 event was held at the Warehouse Event Venue in Downsview Park, which was draped with gorgeous sheer fabrics and lit with lavender lights for more than 300 invited guests.

Guests were greeted by upbeat melodies from violinist Tino Popovic. Beyond appetizer hors d'oeuvres, sweet tables offered a variety of desserts, all donated, to those with a sweet tooth. Guests also had a chance to win one of many gift packages available in the fundraising raffle.

Once again, proceeds went to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's social, recreational, educational, cultural and health programs for seniors. The evening raised $55,400, surpassing the event's $40,000 goal. Programs and organizations that benefited included Circle of Care, social programs at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, and JF & CS' programs for Holocaust survivors.

BAC2Fashion has now raised more than $150,000 to support seniors initiatives in Toronto.

Steven and Marcia Krystal, parents of Andy Krystal, a model in the show, came out to support the cause because, Marcia Krystal said, "both seniors and Holocaust survivors deserve a lot more attention than what we are giving them, because they went through so much." The cause is very close to the Krystals, whose parents, along with those of many other guests, were Holocaust survivors.

The volunteer models sported clothing from top retailers and designers in Toronto and Israel, including Sense of Independence, Tana + Bee, Over The Rainbow, Shenkin West, Jeromes, Masha Apparel, Jilian Dayna, and Intuition.

Along with the soft fabrics, suits and fun bright colours, Tyler Keating and Daniella Watters, two up-and-coming musicians, hit the stage and surprised the audience by performing their latest songs.

In a statement, event chairs Carly Goldberg, Nicole Inwentash, Jilian Naiberg, and Hanna Gofman, noted that "it costs approximately $10,000 per year to care for one senior, and there is a growing waiting list of 250 seniors who currently do not receive adequate care."

BAC2Fashion is just one way that UJA's Community Connect links young adults to the Jewish community. Besides raising money, BAC2Fashion also holds programs such as intergenerational yoga and a Tea and Talent Show that let young adults and seniors build more meaningful relationships with one another. ■

Additional kosher chicken producer expected in 2014

plungen@thecjn.ca

Ontario kosher consumers could have a locally produced source of chickens by the end of the year, according to a spokesperson for Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO), a producers' group that regulates the provincial poultry quota under the authority of the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture.

The CFO received a number of applications to produce kosher chickens to serve the Ontario market under a request for proposal whose deadline expired on May 30.

"We are expectant that we will have an Ontario partner to produce kosher chickens for the Ontario Jewish community, up and running this year," said Michael Edmonds, director of communications and government relations for the CFO.

Edmonds declined to name the applicants or state how many there were. The CFO's board will examine the applications and make a decision based "on the strength of the business proposal," he said.

Edmonds said the CFO had agreed to increase the number of chickens in Ontario that can be processed to meet the kosher consumption needs of the Jewish community. Normally new entrants to the business must purchase the quota held by another processor.

Up until May 2013, kosher consumers in Canada were served by two chicken producers, Marvid, based in Montreal, and Chai, based in Toronto. Chai sold its quota last May to a halal producer, leading to a shortage of kosher chickens.

Marvid has stepped up production to meet consumer demand, but apparently not all Toronto consumers are satisfied with their birds.

"The community very clearly told us they're looking for Ontario kosher chickens," Edmonds said. "We've received numerous calls from consumers and retailers that there was not enough high quality processed kosher chickens in Ontario right now." ■

First Narayever has 650 members

many buildings that housed synagogues fell into disuse, Sibony said. First Narayever, however, became a downtown "home for Orthodox Jews." New residents who moved into the area changed the shul's vision in the 1980s, she added, when the mechitzah came down and it became a traditional-egalitarian synagogue.

First Narayever's treasurer C. David Weyman, who's been a member since the mid-1990s, said that the synagogue is the best of both worlds for him. "It has the traditional service I grew up with in England," he said, adding that he's modern in that he wanted his three daughters, who are now grown, to be able to participate fully. Women take part in minyans, lead services, make aliyah to the Torah and read the Torah portion. "In that sense we are totally egalitarian," he said.

First Narayever is thriving, with some 650 individual members. Sibony, 37, said that members who are in their 30s and 40s are creating a "baby boom in the congregation."

The synagogue seats about 220 people, so holiday overflow services, attended by up to 1,000, are held at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. ■

Terror groups must pay, Israeli legal activist says

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, an Israeli lawyer and human rights activist who fights for the rights of terror victims, will be the keynote speaker at Chabad @ Flamingo's Women of Valour gala dinner.

Darshan-Leitner, founder of Shurat HaDin Israel Law Center, a civil rights organization that seeks to bankrupt terror groups by filing lawsuits against them, said the message she hopes to send at the June 9 event is that the private sector can have a role in the war against terrorism by stopping the flow of money to terror groups.

She said over the past 15 years, she's represented hundreds of terror victims and filed lawsuits against terror organizations and the states that sponsor them.

"We model ourselves on the Southern Poverty Law Center, which is a civil rights organization based in Alabama that goes after neo-Nazi groups, the Ku Klux Klan, and those types of organizations in the United States," she said.

"We have judgments against Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the PLO, the Palestinian Authority, Iran, North Korea, different banks for over $1 billion. We were able to collect more than $120 million that goes into the hands of terror victims and their families."

She said she began filing lawsuits against terror groups at the start of the second intifadah in 2000, in an effort to bankrupt them.

"We wanted to hit them in their pocket and to basically stop terrorism by stopping the flow of money."

She said it's important to note that Israelis aren't the only victims of terror, which became more apparent to the international community after the World Trade Center attacks in 2001.

She said after 9/11 the Americans made changes to the American justice system to reflect that.

"There are new laws that make it easier to file lawsuits in terror cases as opposed to regular negligence cases," Darshan-Leitner said.

She said Canada seems to be following suit.

Two years ago, Canada passed the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA), allowing Canadians to seek damages against Iran and Syria, designated state sponsors of terror. Last year, the Department of Foreign Affairs released a list of Iranian-owned properties in Ottawa, as well as 14 Iranian bank accounts in Canada holding $2.6 million in total.

Darshan-Leitner said she's been involved in cases on behalf of Canadian victims of terror who are seeking damages from terror attacks sponsored by Iran.

"These cases take a long time... but even if you get default judgments you still have to go after the assets of the defendants... and this takes tremendous effort."

Darshan-Leitner said she hopes her lecture will enlighten people about the fact millions of dollars are put into the hands of terrorists through "seemingly innocent charities and that they can have a role in blocking funding."

She added that Canadians should also know "that no terror victims should be left without compensation and terror organizations have to pay. They have to learn that there is a price for terrorism and they have to pay."

The Women of Valour event will honour three women: Eliana Di Biase, an educator with the Toronto Catholic District School Board, director of the Vaughanwood Ratepayers Association, and former director of Hospice Vaughan; Faygie Kaplan, co-director and rebbetzin of Chabad @ Flamingo. ■

Secret of happiness to be revealed by Israeli rabbi

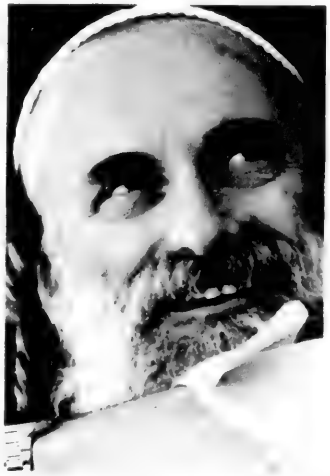
sshefa@thecjn.ca



Rabbi Lazer Brody

Rabbi Lazer Brody, a Jerusalem-based spiritual guide and life coach, said he knows the secret to happiness and is eager to share it with anyone who wants to hear it.

"If you feel a lack of satisfaction, if something is wrong, it means that the soul is lacking and we need to give the soul what it needs... that's emunah, that's a connection with Hashem, the creator," said Rabbi Brody who will be in Toronto June 8 at Chabad Flamingo to deliver a lecture titled "Hashem Rofecha: Holistic healing using Torah as your guide."

"Understand that I am not talking about religion. I never talk about religion. I won't tell anyone to keep Shabbat or keep kosher or do anything else. But the point is, your soul needs a connection to the Creator. You're a tiny part of the Creator. Once you're connected with the Creator, he'll take you where you need to go," he said.

The American-born Rabbi Brody, who spreads this message – based on the works of Rabbi Shalom Arush, an Israeli Breslov rabbi – throughout the English-speaking world, spoke to The CJN about his own path to becoming a ba'al tshuvah and guiding people to lead happier lives.

"I grew up in a very Zionist home... We grew up with a very strong Jewish identity," said Rabbi Brody, who serves as the spiritual guide at the Chut Shel Chessed yeshiva in Jerusalem, which was founded by Rabbi Arush.

"As long as I can remember, I always dreamed about being in Israel. That's what led me to learn agriculture."

After obtaining a degree in agricultural studies at the University of Maryland, he moved to Israel in 1970, bought a farm, joined the Israel Defence Forces and served in an elite infantry unit.

During the Israel-Lebanon in 1982, in his role as a reservist, he was involved in a near-fatal mission in Beirut.

"The PLO was shooting at the Israeli forces from the Russian embassy... The government decided to do a commando mission... it was almost suicidal," he recalled.

"Against all odds, we made it out. As it was, only eight out of 12 of us came home alive. But on the spot, I decided that I had to change my life and I really felt like a divine hand pulled me out of the inferno... There are many people who make foxhole vows and forget about them, but I kept true to my word."

He said he went to Jerusalem and enrolled at Aish Hatorah for nine years of day and night learning. In 1992 he was ordained and he has been working alongside Rabbi Arush for the past 16 years, translating many of his books including the bestseller, The Garden of Emuna.

Rabbi Brody has also written self-help books in Hebrew and English, and recently published Six Days to the Top, a motivational book meant to help people reach their full potential.

Rabbi Brody, who takes a holistic approach to healing the body, mind and soul, said, "People are on pills, people are sick, people are not feeling good and there's stress and anxiety. The human body is not built to handle stress and anxiety... We have to see that our bodies are suffering from stress and anxiety because it is something we're doing wrong."

He said the missing piece to the puzzle is emunah, the pure and complete faith in Hashem and learning to keep outside variables from determining our happiness.

"What western society wants, the bank account, the car, a house in the right neighbourhood, a spouse with the right status – if you still feel something lacking, a particular item you can't put your finger on... you have a type of malnutrition in your soul."

He said he doesn't believe someone can be truly happy without a belief in God.

"I don't believe there is such a person. We're talking about a true sense of inner gratification that doesn't depend on anything external to be happy."

Takes part in health conference convened by Prime Minister Harper

Israel a leader in field of neonatology, says Israeli expert

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A leading Israeli expert in neonatology is eager to export his country's success in saving babies in distress.

Dr. Michael "Miki" Karplus was Israel's sole delegate to last week's summit in Toronto, "Saving Every Woman, Every Child Within Arm's Reach," convened by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to address maternal, newborn and child health.

The three-day conference, which drew dozens of doctors, scientists and experts from around the world, addressed three key objectives, according to a statement: delivering results for mothers and children, doing more together globally, and undertaking "real action" for women's and children's health.

Real action is something Karplus understands; it turns out Israel is a leader in the field of neonatology, a pediatric subspecialty devoted to the health and well-being of newborns.

Over the past few years, through two "mother and baby" units it established in the African nation of Ghana, Israel has learned how to treat troubled newborns cheaply and without expensive medical intervention that is unavailable anyway.

The idea is to involve mothers much more centrally, Karplus told The CJN in an interview before the conference's start. While the notion has taken hold, he's eager to take tangible results to other places.

"The whole idea is to expand," said Karplus, who headed the department of neonatology at Ben-Gurion University's Soroka Medical Center for nearly 30 years.

"We would like to come to international agencies and say, 'look, we have this model and we would like to propose that we take it to an area and set up a number of them. Then we can study [infant] mortality when we compare an area that has a unit with an area that does not.' "

The units in Ghana, established by Mashav, Israel's Agency for International Development Cooperation, with guidance from the Soroka Medical Center, do not rely on expensive respirators, ventilators or incubators.

"The high mortality in babies in the developing world...is due to infections and complications from being born small," Karplus explained. "Many of these complications could be dealt with [using] limited resources so that mortality can be reduced with simple means."

Dr. Michael Karplus in Ghana

> The approach is really to work with the staff who are available. With these very simple means, you can reduce mortality tremendously.
> Dr. Michael "Miki" Karplus

Among the best known methods is so-called "kangaroo mother care," in which the mother, through skin to skin contact, warms her baby. That replaces incubators, which are expensive and when they break down in developing countries, there's no one to fix them, Karplus pointed out.

Underweight babies, meantime, also need warmth, as well as feeding and a clean environment. Great care is taken to allow only the mother to handle her newborn. "Infection will be minimal because no one else is handling the baby. The big danger is cross-infection."

Decades ago, Karplus came to the view that newborns with problems could be saved through basic, inexpensive interventions that did not require a doctor. He and his team developed a training course for nurses and medical assistants based on simple, affordable methods.

In Ghana, the Israelis focused on newborns' most common problems and found that treatments, in most cases, did not require doctors. "There are very few doctors in Africa," Karplus pointed out. "You cannot set up such units in rural areas of Africa if you expect doctors to work there. So the approach is really to work with the staff who are available. With these very simple means, you can reduce mortality tremendously.

"If the condition of the baby deteriorates, we are helpless," he went on. "But the number of babies we will lose because of the lack of respirators is very small. We are going to save, with simple means, the majority of the babies who are now dying."

With just two centres in Ghana, both in the southern town of Kumasi, it's impossible to tell whether Israel's efforts have made a dent in the country's infant mortality rate, which in 2012 stood at 49 per 1,000 live births (Canada's rate is five, Israel's is three).

That's why this year, Israel will evaluate its units, both from a health and cost-effectiveness standpoint.

As a pioneer in the field, Israel was represented at the Toronto conference to share its experience in Africa and propose that its model spread elsewhere, Karplus noted.

"We started very early, 20 years ago, before there was an international trend [and] nobody was interested in this kind of approach," said Karplus. "Nowadays, it is the internationally accepted way of doing things."

Asked whether Israel is known for its work in the field, Karplus replied, "not enough. There are so many countries with very high neo-natal mortality that would gain so much if these units could be set up."■

Probe Muslim Brotherhood, report urges

plungen@thecjn.ca

A report on the Muslim Brotherhood in North America, which includes a substantial section on Canada, names names and identifies mainstream Muslim organizations linked to the fanatical Islamic group.

It calls on the Canadian government to "pursue a wider investigation into the activities of the Muslim Brotherhood."

In doing so, said the report's author, Tom Quiggin, it should consider co-operating with an ongoing investigation into the Brotherhood in the United Kingdom.

Quiggin, a member of the Terrorism and Security Experts of Canada Network (TSEC), prescribes a series of responses to what he termed a political and cultural threat to Canadians.

He suggests in the report that the federal government should look at local organizations and their senior membership, which he identified as affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood. He advises that federal authorities should review the charitable status of these organizations and whether the Canadian Border Security Agency ought to increase screening of individuals from Syria, Egypt, Tunisia and Saudi Arabia, among others.

He also suggests the government ought to consider requiring those who advocate "imposing foreign standards on Canadians through political means" to register as lobbyists.

At the heart of the report is a contention by Quiggin that "the role of the Muslim Brotherhood does not appear to be consistent with values of the Canadian Constitution, the Canadian Charter of Rights nor the U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights."

The report cites the Muslim Brotherhood's own explicit goal as "Sabotaging the Miserable House through the Process of Settlement and Civilization Jihad."

Quggin told CBC News that the threat facing Canadians is not physical as much as "cultural" and "political."

The Muslim Brotherhood has tried to spread influence and raise money through domestic groups, that have "sought to systematically and repeatedly circumvent and break Canadian regulations and laws," the report said.

"One of the points of this report was to say, 'Hey look, this group exists, the amount of money they're moving around runs tens of millions of dollars, they're funding terrorist groups all over the place," Quiggin told the CBC. "At a certain point we have to ask, 'Do we want this behaviour to continue?'"

The report calls for additional requirements on Canadian charities receiving funds from abroad, including divulging "the amounts and sources of the funds" and for reciprocity with the countries from which moneys are flowing to Canada so that "money from foreign countries should only be acceptable if reciprocity exists with the country of the donors involved."

The report pointed to a recent development in which a Canadian organization, International Relief Fund for the Afflicted and Needy (IRFAN-Canada), was listed as a terrorist entity. Is this "the start of a trend or a 'one off' event is not clear, but it does send a message of its own," the report stated.

A spokesperson for Foreign Minister John Baird told the National Post that Ottawa is aware of the U.K. review of the groups and will be determining "possible next steps in short order." ■

Israeli dance troupe marks 50 years in Winnipeg

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

In 1964, Talmud Torah nursery teacher Sarah Sommer had a vision of creating an Israeli dance troupe in Winnipeg.

According to historian Allan Levine in his Coming of Age, a History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, Sommer had originally been introduced to Israeli dance five years earlier, when the Inbal Dance Company from Israel performed in Winnipeg. And in 1963, she and her husband, Alex, went to Israel, where she spent five weeks with the Histadrut Dance Group.

Sommer later formed what became the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble with eight teenage girls who were attending Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, as the city's Jewish high school was known at the time.

Sadly, she was stricken by cancer just a couple of years later and didn't live to see her dream reach full fruition. However, her husband, Alex, and several members of the community stepped up and built on what she had started, and the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble has gone from strength to strength.

This month, the internationally acclaimed Israeli folk ensemble is celebrating its 50th anniversary with a gala concert June 10 at Winnipeg's Centennial Concert Hall, followed by an appearance in early July in Israel, where Chai will represent Canada at the Karmiel Dance Festival.

"While we will be performing some of our highlight pieces from the past 50 years, many of our pieces at the concert will be new dances," said Tracy Kasner Greaves, Chai's artistic director for the last 11 years and a member of Chai for 22 years.

Chai Folk Ensemble dancers dancing Hava Netzeh, the closing piece they do at every show, at Folklorama last year.

> People are constantly asking me how we do it in Winnipeg, how such a relatively small Jewish community has been able to support Chai all these years. There is nothing else like Chai in North America
> Tracy Kasner Greaves

She said Chai will be introducing new dances by leading Israeli choreographer Shai Gottesman and former Chai dancer and professional choreographer Farrah Fernando (now based in Toronto), as well as new works by choreographers from Mexico City and Argentina and Chai's own Elan Marchinko.

The show will also be celebrating the 125th anniversary of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest and oldest congregation. Joining the Chai performers on stage will be the Shaarey Zedek choir, the congregation's Rabbi Alan Green, Cantor Anibal Maas and past presidents and leaders of both Shaarey Zedek and Chai.

On June 6, Kasner Greaves said, the shul will host a community dinner featuring about 100 Chai alumni (including the original eight dancers), many of whom will be coming from throughout North America for the occasion.

On June 8, the alumni will put on their own show at the newly opened Regent Casino Theatre. That show is being co-directed by Chai alumni David Gale and Casey Chisick (now both of Toronto), Leah Braemer and Hillel Sommer, son of the late Sarah Sommer, who as a four-year-old attended the original rehearsals with his mother.

Over the years, Chai has performed in every major city in Canada, as well as in Florida, California and Mexico City. The Karmiel Festival will be Chai's second appearance in Israel. Kasner Greaves said it has commissioned award-winning choreographer and former Winnipegger Lindsay Nelko to choreograph a new work for the event.

The contemporary piece, based on a combination of the musical pieces Adamah v'Shamayim (Land and Sky) and Zum Zum, is about honouring the land, Kasner Greaves said.

Chai comprises some 40 singers, dancers and musicians ranging in age from teens to adults in their early 40s.

"People are constantly asking me how we do it in Winnipeg, how such a relatively small Jewish community has been able to support Chai all these years. There is nothing else like Chai in North America," Kasner Greaves said.

"The reason is that Winnipeg's Jewish community is unique in its level of commitment. Chai provides young people with a Jewish cultural outlet, encourages a love for Israel and helps young people who are new to our city to find new friends."

Kasner Greaves related a story about coming to a recent Chair rehearsal to find a new member of the troupe, a teenage girl recently arrived from Israel, crying.

"As soon as she heard the music, she burst into tears," she said. "She was overwhelmed being in Winnipeg and hearing Israeli music that took her back to Israel. She understood what we are doing here. It's not about ego or professional dancing. It's about community and love of Israel."■

Surprise Masada wedding for couple on Mega Mission

jarnold@cjnews.ca

Julie Morneau and Steve Lupovich had expected to get married quietly later this month in their rabbi's study, with only a few relatives present.

Instead, the Montreal couple made history when they were wed atop Masada before hundreds of people, and they only knew less than 48 hours earlier that it was going to happen.

Morneau and Lupovich were among the 570 participants in Federation CJA's Montreal Mega Mission to Israel, the largest organized trip of its kind in almost two decades.

Co-chairs Jonathan Wener and Gail Adelson-Marcovitz had their hearts set on holding a wedding on this site of an ancient fortification where 960 Jewish rebels committed mass suicide.

Wener and Adelson-Marcovitz had permission to do so – they just had to find the couple.

They correctly believed such a ceremony would be unforgettable for both the bride and groom, and everyone else. According to their information, a wedding has never been held on Masada.

When word got around that Morneau and Lupovich were planning to soon tie the knot, Wener approached them to move the date up – offering an all-expenses paid wedding. That was at the Friday night Shabbat dinner; the group was scheduled to visit Masada on the Sunday, May 18.

"We said, 'whoa, whoa', not so quick, we have everything arranged with our rabbi and family," said Morneau, who was in Israel for the first time.

When they learned their Rabbi Adam Scheier of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim was on the mission, and would be honoured to the perform the ceremony on Masada – and again on the planned date of June 22, the couple relented.

"It was also so sudden, we really didn't have time to think," she said. "We just got caught up in the excitement." It was a second marriage for both of them. Morneau converted to Judaism 20 years ago.

Lupovich was concerned about his mother not being there, but she gave her wholehearted blessing.

Morneau remembered she didn't have a dress. A woman on their bus lent her a white sleeveless one, while Lupovich wore the white shirt and capris he had packed.

"We had no rings or any time to shop because it was Shabbat. The federation said, 'Don't worry, we'll take care of it'," Morneau said. Ditto for the ketubah.

Morneau changed in a guard's hut on Masada with the help of women from her bus. "We had been hiking and I was full of sunscreen," she recalled. "I didn't even have a mirror to get ready."

Someone did her makeup, and a veil and bouquet of white roses were suddenly produced to complete her outfit. On her feet were flip flops.

Ten women from the mission served as bridesmaids, wearing shorts and T-shirts.

The chupah was improvised by hoisting a tallit atop four poles. The five other rabbis on the mission had a role in reciting the blessings.

All 600 or so people present were, in fact, spontaneous participants, not merely spectators, said Wener, "as if we were all on the bimah."

The wedding took place following an awards presentation for 100 IDF junior officers that had put everyone in an emotional mood.

As the sun set, everyone descended on the snaking path down to the Judean Desert where tents were set up for a lavish torch-lit dinner. Israel Philharmonic musicians played.

"The whole thing was magical, surreal," said Morneau.

Lupovich added: "It was very spiritual, almost as if it was blessed by God because everything aligned so perfectly."

He found it an awesome sight to have hundreds of people in a close circle around them as they took their vows and then to see them winding down the hillside single file behind them.

"Many people said that not only was it the best wedding they ever attended, it was the most incredible thing they have ever seen," he said.

However, he said, "one storekeeper said to me, 'Why would you get married up there? It's a place of tragedy.' As Rabbi Scheier said, our wedding represented the circle of life. It showed the world that we [the Jewish people] survived."

Wener feels the impromptu wedding was the icing on the cake, so to speak, of a successful trip that allowed a large contingent of Montrealers to bond as they experienced Israel.

"My sense is that it had an extraordinary galvanizing effect. As I told Julie and Steve, the gift you have given us is much greater than what we have given you." ■

Newlyweds Julie Morneau and Steve Lupovich are feted at their wedding on Masada.

School funding is dead: Wynne

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne is emphatic: the issue of public funding for private religious schools is over and has been for a while.

In the June 12 provincial election, "the discussion is over in terms of [funding for] faith-based schools," Wynne told The CJN in a brief telephone interview while campaigning in Sault Ste Marie.

"We went through a very extended discussion on this in the 2007 election campaign, and we're focusing on the education system as it exists," said Wynne, a former provincial education minister who became premier in February 2013 following Dalton McGuinty's unexpected resignation after nine years in office.

"We've made a lot of investments in the publicly-funded education system and it's world-renowned. I think people in Ontario were pretty clear in 2007 that they wanted to see public money go into the public schools."

Like other provincial politicians, Wynne has doubtless learned a lesson from former Ontario Conservative leader John Tory.

Famously, in the 2007 provincial election, Tory promised to bring faith-based schools into the public system. The pledge, if implemented, would have outdone his predecessor, Mike Harris, who as premier, introduced a tax break for parents of children in religious schools – the first relief of its kind.

At the time, it sounded like small change, but the issue blew up and became the 2007 campaign's cause celebre. It also cost Tory the race, with many Ontarians soundly declaring that public money should not flow to private and religious schools.

The whole matter of public money for private schools was so hot that when he became premier in 2003, among McGuinty's first actions was to retroactively cancel the

Progressive Conservative Party

Tim Hudak

For Hudak, it's all about jobs, jobs, jobs

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

They say that to be successful in an election campaign, you have to keep your message simple and hammer it home over and over again.

In the case of Progressive Conservative Party Leader Tim Hudak, the message is jobs, jobs, jobs. And then there's career jobs, middle class jobs, and jobs with "more take-home pay."

In a province that has seen the loss of 300,000 manufacturing jobs since 2002 and has more than 500,000 people unemployed, he's hoping it has some resonance.

You can colour the ridings where there are substantial concentrations of Jewish voters mostly Liberal red, but Hudak believes that for the Jewish community, like the broader range of Ontario voters, the most important issue is jobs.

Campaigning in Thornhill, currently held by Tory Gila Martow and York Centre, represented by longtime Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter, two seats he hopes his party can win this time around, he said voters are concerned their children are finding it difficult to find gainful employment, even with university degrees.

His "Million Jobs Plan" is geared to get more people working "in good career jobs," he said in a telephone interview. That will create the tax base needed to fund priority items such as health care and education, he added.

The plan – which he said would add 125,000 jobs a year for eight years – is part of a broader approach to incentivize the private sector, and move away from the proposition "that government always knows best," he continued.

More affordable energy, a reduction in business-stiflng red tape, and private/public partnerships will free up the private sector to get Ontarians back to work, he said.

Green Party

Mike Schreiner

Bringing honesty to government

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

It's doubtful whether a central plank in the platform of the Green Party of Ontario will appeal to many parents with children in Jewish day schools.

If the Greens take power – and all the polls show them well back of the Liberal and Conservative front-runners – they would bring an end to the Roman Catholic School Board and merge it with public boards. They'd do the same with French and English boards.

Not much hope there for supporters of public funding for religious schools. Of course, none of the other parties are making that an issue. According to most political analysts, school funding has proven to be the fatal third rail of Ontario politics and spelled doom for former Tory leader John Tory.

Mike Schreiner, an entrepreneur who operates his own small business specializing in local foods, said support for religious education "was soundly rejected by Ontario voters."

But referring to the education file in general, Schreiner asked: "Is it fair in Ontario that one religion receives public funding [Roman Catholic], and no other religion does? I don't think that is fair."

Jews should rightly wonder why their Catholic neighbours receive that benefit when they don't, he said.

His solution, however, is not to extend funding to other groups.

"Let's go the opposite direction that Mr. Tory proposed. The prescription we're putting forward is let's just have one public system, in French and English, and that will create fairness, it will address human rights concerns around discrimination, access and hiring based on religion and sexual orientation, and we will have savings of between $1 billion and $1.6 billion that can be reinvested in our children's classrooms.

Liberals not planning on cuts to social service agencies

Tories' Equity in Education Tax Credit, which would have given parents tax breaks of up to $3,500 per child. For virtually his entire time in office, McGuinty came in for harsh criticism in Jewish circles for discriminating against non-Christians, since the Roman Catholic system was and continues to be fully funded.

While that issue is off the table, The CJN asked whether a future Liberal government would at least commit to funding certain health services, such as speech and language therapy, in private and faith-based schools. Apparently, the answer is no.

"Obviously, there are services that are delivered through the [provincial] community care access centres to children who go to a full range of public and private schools," Wynne said. "So those programs remain in place."

On the other hand, if re-elected, Wynne's Liberals are not planning to cut funding to social service agencies.

"As you know, Jewish Family & Child, Reena and Jewish Vocational Service all receive funding from Ontario. We have no plans to cut those."

What about boosting funding to Jewish social service agencies if needed?

"To the extent that we make investments in services across the board, absolutely," she said. "Those are the kind of services that we know need support. The work that Reena does, for example, dealing with supporting adults with disabilities… we've committed $810 million in our budget as part of our plan, and if we are re-elected, we are going to invest that money in services for people with developmental disabilities.

"I can't tell you exactly which organizations are going to get how much money," she noted, "but the fact is that organizations that provide those services should benefit from that money."

Wynne said Ontario's warm relationship with Israel is resonating with Jewish voters, and she credits her Liberals for growing it.

It was kick-started in 2005, when then-Israeli deputy prime minister Ehud Olmert and McGuinty signed the Ontario-Israel Memorandum of Understanding, with each side committing about $1 million to facilitate at least a dozen joint economic ventures.

Five years later, McGuinty visited Israel, where President Shimon Peres asked Ontario to partner with Israel on leading-edge brain research.

Wynne pointed out that Eric Hoskins, Ontario's economic development, trade and employment minister, visited Israel last autumn. In late April, the Liberals announced the opening of an office in Israel to help promote business and trade between the two jurisdictions.

"The relationship between Ontario and Israel is very important," Wynne said. The trade office "is something that the [Jewish] community is pleased we are moving forward with."

She also pointed out that it was a Liberal MPP, Mike Colle, who introduced a motion in 2012 to designate each May as Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario. The measure received all-party support.

Asked whether she has perceived a coattail effect, in which Prime Minister Stephen Harper's staunch support for Israel has attracted voters to provincial Tory Leader Tim Hudak, Wynne said, "I haven't experienced that, quite frankly."

She added: "I see the Jewish community very much as part of the fabric of this province and a very important part of the fabric of this province. That's always been my position and continues to be." ■

Funding for religious schools not on Conservative agenda

"This is all crystal clear," he said.

He said a Tory government would improve the delivery of health care "under the OHIP umbrella" by supporting front-line professionals who actually deliver health care.

As to an issue that has been a priority issue for Jewish community leadership for decades – public money for religious schools – Hudak said Ontario voters have considered it and turned it down.

"We're not going down that path," he said.

Instead, Hudak quickly shifted the conversation to the support the Progressie Conservatives have shown for the Jewish community over the years, such as standing against Israeli apartheid week.

"That has no business on our campuses," he said.

He applauded the pro-Israel position taken by the federal, Conservative, government and criticized an annual anti-Israel hate-fest held on government grounds.

Referring to the al-Quds Day Rally, a pro-Hezbollah event that has been held for the past few years on the grounds of the legislature, Hudak said, "We say it has no business to be at Queen's Park."

He referenced a visit he made to Israel in the company of the late federal finance minister Jim Flaherty, saying he was impressed with the country's beauty, its vibrant democracy and its innovative business sector.

He called Israel's technological strength and ability to innovate, "a model around the world."

Asked if he supported a recent move by the Liberal government to establish a representative office in Israel to promote trade and business relationships between the two jurisdictions, Hudak said, "I'm all for greater partnership."

There is room to grow a partnership between Israel and Ontario, particularly in the realm of high tech and environmental technology, he said.

Hudak said his visit to Israel was "spiritually moving." As a Catholic he felt special significance when he visited holy sites, including Jerusalem.

One of the more emotional parts of his visit was at Yad Vashem, the memorial to the victims of the Holocaust.■

Greens aim to 're-imagine' government for 21st century

That benefits any child in a public system."

"That's just creating a system that is fair, fiscally responsible and addresses human rights concerns," Schreiner said.

Would the Greens' approach to education – favouring a single publicly-funded service provider – be applicable to other services delivered by community agencies, such as family services, immigration aid and the like?

No, Schreiner explained. "We're only talking about education."

But in "re-imagining government for the 21st century," Schreiner said government might not always be the best organization to deliver public services. Sometimes it ought to partner with the non-profit and charitable sectors to come up with innovative ways of offering services at a more effective cost.

"That I would be very supportive of," he said.

Asked whether ancillary health services delivered to children in schools through the Ministry of Education, such as occupational therapy and pyschological assessments, should also be available to religious schools, Schreiner said he was not familiar with the issue."I'm definitely open to look at that."

"The Green Party is all about integrity and openness. The key issue for me is what is fair to our students and how can we maximize services to people in the most cost effective way."

Asked about "green issues" per se, such as the Green Energy Act and its effect on the cost of electricity, Schreiner cited Ontario Energy Board reports. According to those documents, "over the last five years the biggest contributor to the increased prices in electricity is actually nuclear cost overruns, not green energy. So about 46 per cent of the increase is due to nuclear cost overruns and contracts and about six to nine per cent due to green energy. So there's a lot of misunderstanding about what's driving up electricity and energy costs.

"The Liberals have made two mistakes. The first one is they prioritized new generation over conservation. The cheapest and greenest solution to our energy needs is helping people save money by saving energy," he said.

The Greens would create a fund to help Ontarians make their homes more energy efficient, he continued.

Schreiner said nuclear power should be replaced by cheaper hydro power from Quebec at a savings of $1 billion a year. And the government would invest that billion by providing grants to retrofit homes to better conserve energy and reduce costs.

Addressing the issue of poverty, Schreiner said the Green Party would double the child benefit to help lift 400,000 kids out of poverty.

It would be paid for by cancelling "the Liberal's 10 per cent hydro handout, which primarily benefits the wealthy and costs $1.1 billion."

The Green Party would tackle unemployment – 500,000 Ontarians are currently out of work – by lowering payroll taxes for small businesses by doubling the exemption from $450,000 to $900,000 for companies with payrolls under $5 million.

People are sick of the scandals, "magic math" and "political games" at Queen's Park, he said. "The Green Party is on a mission to bring honesty, integrity and good public policy to Queen's Park. I think we need more honesty in politics." ■

Doctor puts focus on people with ASD, Down syndrome

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Dr. Jacob A. Burack, a researcher and a professor in McGill University's educational and counselling psychology department, was in Toronto late last month to speak at the Current Trends in Pediatric Neuro-Developmental Disabilities conference, co-organized by the Zareinu Educational Centre.

His work over the past 30 years has focused on the development of attention and perception among people with autism spectrum disorders (ASD) and Down syndrome.

Burack spoke to The CJN about how research developments have changed the way special needs children are and should be treated.

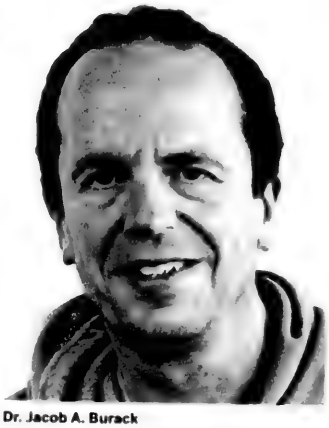
What was it 30 years ago that prompted you to want to work in this field?

I always wanted to work with kids. I worked for three summers at Camp Reena – the Reena Foundation is still around, but the camp has been closed for quite a few years. So I spent three summers working as a counsellor at Camp Reena, and that's what changed my life, and I started focusing on that.

In your 30 years of research, what would you say is your most significant finding, most surprising finding or the most interesting thing about your work?

For autism specifically, I think that I found a kid with autism has a lot of strengths and people always focus on the weaknesses. Specifically, in the type of work that I do about how children retain and perceive objects in the environment, they actually have strengths, quite a few strengths, that in some way are to their benefit, but also lead to them seeing the world in a different way than some other people might.

We actually have a theory with a colleague of mine at the University of Montreal, Laurent Mottron, called the enhanced perceptual functioning model of autism, and it talks about how autistic behavior is a result of better-than-average perception. It's become very popular. It's one of the ways of understanding people with autistic behaviour.



Dr. Jacob A. Burack

> What's really important is that the Jewish community needs to make more of an effort to include people with disabilities to be part of our community. We find in schools, in synagogues, and maybe most important, in the social fabric that people with disabilities need to be integrated to be part of it.

Have there been a lot of changes in the past 30 years in the way children with disabilities are treated?

There have been. But I think what's more important is the attitude toward people with disabilities. I have a close colleague who was actually one of my former graduate students who is now spearheading all sorts of work in Quebec about transitioning young people with disabilities from school to the work force, into college programs. We have an understanding that people, even with disabilities, are people who have aspirations and hopes and that is the most important thing. We are much more looking at the strengths of people with disabilities and we see that, as my old graduate school adviser used to say, seeing them as a whole person and not just thinking about them in terms of their disability.

What's your message to the Jewish community about special needs children?

What's really important is that the Jewish community needs to make more of an effort to include people with disabilities to be part of our community. We find in schools, in synagogues, and maybe most important, in the social fabric that people with disabilities need to be integrated to be part of it.

I think there is a stigma. I think some schools don't want to deal with it. Many of the Jewish schools may be very success-oriented. I've travelled all over Canada, all over Quebec and in the most remote places, like the Gaspé region, they have many fewer facilities and resources than we have, but they have no problem including those kids. If you belong to the community, you're in that school with the rest of the kids in that community. I don't think that happens with the schools here. I think young adults don't have the kinds of social lives they should be having and that should be a priority for the Jewish community and see it as one of our major missions.

Is there anything you've learned about children with autism or Down syndrome that could maybe help parents give their children the best treatment?

As I tell my friends who are parents in general, for the most part, parents need to trust their own instincts in a lot of ways. Too often they're being told they need to do this or that, but most parents have good instincts. They know their own children better than anyone else. I think especially if their child has some kind of a disability, or is different somehow, those parents know them the best. I think it's important for parents to keep that in mind. The unfortunate reality is that parents need to be on top of the system. Children can fall through the cracks and they need to be persistent as much as they can. The third thing I would say is that parents need to be wary or careful about these "miracle interventions" or popular interventions. It's something I often speak about. Parents, in a lot of ways, want to do anything to help their children, and then they get taken in by people. Unfortunately, a lot of people make a lot of money off children with disabilities. ■

2013 Survey of American Jews—Lessons for Canada

How is Jewish identity and practice changing in America?
What can this tell us about what is happening in our own Jewish community?

Presentation and Panel Discussion: Monday June 23, 2014, 7:30 pm Congregation Darchei Noam, 864 Sheppard Avenue West, Toronto ON

Presenter Greg Smith, Director of U.S. Religion Surveys, Religion & Public Life Project, Pew Research Center (Washington DC)

Panel Dr. Frank Bialystok, Centre for Canadian Studies at University College, University of Toronto

Bernie Farber, former CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Senior Vice President with Gemini Power Corp.

Rabbi Aaron Levy, Founder and Executive Director of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism

Moderator Janice Stein, Director, Munk School of Global Affairs, University of Toronto

Come hear about the recent landmark national survey of American Jews, and participate in a discussion with our panel of Canadian experts on what it might tell us about the Canadian Jewish community.

Doors open at 7:00 pm, and the program begins at 7:30pm.

Is inclusion an illusion?

JARED KRYBUS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I was born in Toronto. I'm 29 and have two younger siblings, Jordan, 26, and Karla, 22. My parents, Manny and Marlene, adopted me at birth. They're the only parents I've known, and I'm so fortunate that they have treated me like their own. They instilled in me a "never give up" attitude and told me not to let moments define who I am.

I live in a condo by myself. I work as a teacher's assistant at Zareinu Educational Centre and as a program assistant at DANI. I pay all my own expenses. I play goalie on a hockey team. I'm into hip hop and like to freestyle rap. And I love cooking, especially pasta with chicken.

I've been told that I have something called global delay, but I don't really know what it means. All I know is that I have a delay with processing, fine motor issues and a speech impediment. I stammer, and when I get really stuck, my mouth starts to tic or my hand goes up. I've had lots of awkward situations where people thought I was drunk, and that hurts.

I grew up in Thornhill and went to Vaughan Secondary School. I was in what they call an intensive program, where my classmates and I would integrate with the other kids for subjects such as gym and art. Kids would make fun of me in the playground and ask me why I spoke funny, so I became a great storyteller, because I really didn't know what to tell them.

> People don't want to see people like me get hurt. They don't want to see me struggle. But struggling is good.

I can never be myself. People always interrupt me and correct me and don't allow me to follow through. It takes me longer to process things than other people, but I was taught that it's better to take your time and focus on what you're doing and put your heart and love into it. But everyone is in a hurry. They don't take the time to hear me out. I'll be talking and they're trying to figure out what I'm saying, and they'll say the word before I have a chance to say it. I don't know what their intentions are – maybe nothing, maybe ignorance – but they don't have time, so they think it'll be faster if they try to figure it out themselves. I'm used to it by now, but it still annoys me.

I love working with people with challenges. I already advocate for myself, so I'd like to become a spokesperson who advocates for others like me, to help them find jobs, to prove to society that everyone is capable. I would love to change the perception that people with special needs are insufficient. We have to try to include them in society, even though they should already be considered part of society.

Everyone is human. Everyone has issues. People forget that every child is human. Instead of calling them "a special needs child" they should be calling them "a child with special needs" or "a child with Down syndrome." Put the human features first and the challenges second.

People are under the illusion that they're not special needs. Everybody creates their own normal. I play hockey every week, and that's normal for me. I've had a stutter all my life, so that's normal to me. It doesn't make me who I am, but it's part of me.

I am where I am not in spite of my limitations, but because of them. For example, I've developed problem-solving skills: if I can't get a word out, then I say an easier word. It has taught me to go with the flow and to take chances and not be afraid of the outcome. People are usually awkward around me, because they don't know what I'm going to say or how intelligent I'm going to be. But I can keep up a conversation with anyone about politics or sports or whatever. I may not have higher education, but that's doesn't mean that I'm not educated or I don't have my views or opinions.

People don't want to see people like me get hurt. They don't want to see me struggle. But struggling is good. It lets you know how to handle things, to problem-solve. You've got to learn how to deal with your struggles yourself, rather than have other people smooth things over for you.

If I could offer advice to people I'd say this: have no expectations whatsoever, have no preconceived notions. Don't judge. Saying, "He can't do it" is dismissive. There's a reason for everything! A child might not be able to communicate by mouth, but give him an iPad or another communication device and he can tell you everything.

I've learned so much from Zareinu's children. They've taught me to smile every day, and that when you think you can't do something, that's when you show people that you can. And that when you least expect it, that's when greatness happens. ■

Canadian vet fought from Normandy to Germany

plungen@thecjn.ca

Lawrence Levy, who served in a forward position in the Canadian Army during World War II, proudly displays a flag he received in 2000 to commemorate the liberation of Holland. At right, during the war years. PAUL LUNGEN PHOTO

At 89, Lawrence Levy still has a twinkle in his eye, a ready smile and a sharp mind. He can remember in minute detail stuff that happened 70 years ago – just don't ask him what he did yesterday, he quips.

Seventy years ago, Levy was a volunteer in the Canadian Armed Forces. His unit, the Second Survey Regiment, Royal Canadian Artillery, was part of a follow-up wave of troops consolidating the foothold in Normandy established on D-Day, June 6, by units of the Canadian, British and American armies.

When he arrived in Normandy a few weeks after D-Day, the monumental seaborne invasion also known as Operation Overlord, Allied armies had advanced seven or eight miles inland. They were bogged down in front of the French town of Caen, which had been a British objective for the first day of the invasion.

When Levy's squad arrived on the scene, it was clear they'd driven into a particular kind of hell. Fighting at Caen was intense. The Germans had placed the bulk of their western panzer, or tank, forces in front of the city, which was a key crossroads and offered Germany an effective defensive position.

Levy's job as part of a five-man squad was to radio back to the artillery command the unit's observations of how effective its bombardments were. To get that sort of information, the unit had to be right at the front of the front, at the tip of the spear, so to speak.

So how far forward was he, actually?

"I could almost holler at those guys," he said.

Of course, hollering wasn't on his mind. Keeping his head down and staying alive was. He experienced moments of terror during the war, but the most frightening times were those he spent at Caen – even more frightening than the time later in the campaign when a German bomb landed on a Belgian school that had been turned into a barracks. He and other soldiers had to be dug out, he said, adding that despite the blast, he didn't suffer any injuries.

At Caen, though, survival meant staying underground in a slit trench he dug to avoid the bullets, bombs and shrapnel that could cut your life short in an instant.

"I couldn't move," he recalled. "The Germans were knocking hell out of us."

When they used "sound ranging" to identify German artillery, the unit's radio frequencies alerted German units to their presence and invited retaliation. "As soon as that happens, the world comes apart," he said.

One time, his judgment suffered a lapse. A fellow soldier one night left the protection of the trench, ventured into no-man's land and came back with food and drink for all. The next day, Levy decided to try it for himself, but he was quickly pinned down by enemy fire and he spent hours in a trench, waiting for darkness. Under cover of night, "I went back to my trench and stayed there."

> I couldn't move. The Germans were knocking hell out of us.

The battle for Caen marked a remarkable success story for Canadian fighters. The 3rd Canadian Division suffered some 1,200 casualties in the battle, more than at D-Day, but they liberated the city and opened the door to further advances in Normandy.

Their opposition included a formidable German fighting unit, the 12th SS, also known as the "Hitler Youth" regiment. Fanatical fighters, they were also, of course, fanatical Nazis. When they captured Canadian soldiers, their commanding officer, Gen. Kurt Meyer, ordered them shot.

That was just the sort of fate Levy had hoped to avoid by receiving permission to alter the religion on his dog tags – the identifying plates carried on a necklace by all soldiers – from "Hebrew" to Protestant.

He knew he'd be at the front and risked capture. The last thing he wanted is for the Nazis to know he was a Jew. Later, when he saw Canadian soldiers being buried in mass graves, he realized that with his dog tags, he too would have been buried under a cross. Not exactly what he signed up for.

When he enlisted in the army as an 18-year-old, fighting as a Jew against Nazism was only part of his motivation, he said. He was greatly influenced by the ill-fated Dieppe raid in August 1942. When casualty lists were published back in Toronto, he recognized a lot of the guys who were killed. They were from his neighbourhood, the area around Palmerston and Euclid avenues and Major Street. He wanted to avenge their deaths.

He enlisted, declining the recruiter's suggestion he serve in the infantry. Instead he asked to be placed in a mobile outfit. He joined the survey unit, which contained a fair number of other Jewish guys, he said.

His unit consisted of himself armed with a Sten gun, a driver and two sergeants, who made the observations and passed them along to him to radio back. Three of the five survived the war. The driver was killed. The other soldier was wounded and his ultimate fate is unknown to him.

Levy saw plenty of death. He recalls vividly trying to help soldiers in a Polish armoured unit of 20 to 30 Sherman tanks who were wiped out by Germany's dreaded 88-mm high velocity guns. There was not much left of them to help.

Following the battle for Caen, Levy's unit took part in the battle for Falaise, another important engagement in which Allied forces attempted to encircle and capture German units.

From there, his unit and Canadian forces headed north, through Belgium. They played a vital role in opening the port of Antwerp to Allied shipping by clearing out an entrenched German army in the Scheldt estuary, which cut off the port from the sea. From there it was northwards to Nijmegen, Holland, and then across the Rhine into Germany. Levy was in the port city of Emden when Germany surrendered. Remarkably, after all these years, he can recall his unit's advance, city by city, town by town.

In 2000, Levy joined other Canadian veterans on a trip to the Netherlands, where they were showered with food and drink, not to mention gratitude for liberating the country from the Nazis.

"It was a great feeling to be with the Dutch people," he recalled.

It remains a pleasant memory that made all the difficult ones worthwhile. ■

Do cultural barriers keep numbers down?

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Lawrence Sager, who rose through the ranks over his 25-year career to become a sergeant with the Toronto Police Service, emphatically insists that as an organization, the TPS is not systemically anti-Semitic.

"But being Jewish hasn't helped me in this job. I'm not going to say there is anti-Semitism, but there is a stigmatism," Sager said.

Speaking to The CJN about some of the reasons why Jews don't typically consider careers in law enforcement and why they're so underrepresented in this field, the Montreal-born Sager discussed whether anti-Semitism is a problem.

"There has been real anti-Semitism on the service, like any other organization. It's not that Toronto Police is anti-Semitic. It's not, but you get some people, who just out of ignorance, are," he said.

"There was a sergeant of mine, who I always considered a friend, and he always made jokes about Jews. I used to let things roll off my back and a couple of my guys came up to me and said, 'Lawrence, you know what? He's not joking'... and they felt bad... because he was even making them uncomfortable."

He said that somehow his sergeant's behaviour was leaked to the unit commander, and he was asked to make a formal apology.

Morris Zbar, who spent about 27 years working in corrections in various roles, starting out as a prison guard and working his way up to serve as Ontario's deputy minister of corrections, said when he first started working in a maximum security prison in 1975, "there weren't very many Jewish prison guards. I'm not sure there were any."

Zbar said that although he didn't experience "overt" anti-Semitism, his Jewishness was questioned by his colleagues.

"There were references made when I first started... Here I was a Jewish boy with a master's degree working on a doctorate, working as a prison guard and people were wondering, so there was a little suspicion, a little concern," he said.

"People would say, 'How come you're working here? Don't you have money?' But to me, that wasn't said in a mean, personal way," he said, adding that it was more of a "characterization based on ignorance."

"Inmates would sometimes say, 'Dirty Jew,' and things like that... but it is what it is, and certainly, in terms of my career, I wasn't hindered, because I ended up being deputy minister."

Jacob Berkenblit, a probation officer with the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, is newer to the field, having worked in the system for the past eight years.

He said he hasn't faced anti-Semitism, but he did recall a client who asked him if he read the Bible, and Berkenblit responded that he was Jewish.

It wasn't until months later that his client mentioned that "the judge [in his case] was Jewish, the lawyer was Jewish, I'm Jewish, and we're all out to get him," Berkenblit recalled.

"But I've never felt that my religion or beliefs were ever compromised, used as a negative, used as a positive, used against me. It's never been an issue."

Sager believes the fact that law enforcement professionals have so little contact with members of the Jewish community feeds into the stereotypes and general ignorance.

He said that even in Toronto's 32 Division – bordered by Steeles and Lawrence avenues to the north and south, and by Bayview Avenue and the CN Rail line (near Dufferin Street) to the east and west – which serves a large Jewish community, some of his colleagues are still ignorant about the community.

"They come here, they police a Jewish community and they take a certain viewpoint and make fun of people, whether it's because of the Sabbath elevator being hypocritical, or even if you need the police, you're not going to call them because it's the Sabbath, and to them, it sounds stupid," he said.

"There is ignorance on the part of the police into the customs of Orthodox Jews. This Jewish population sometimes views this lack of understanding as intolerance, which it is not. The service has seen little need to learn the customs of the Jewish population, as there is little interaction with this community. They seldom call the police and are not frequently caught committing crimes."

Zbar estimated that there are about 80 Jewish inmates in federal prisons across the country.

"The Jewish community is not considered a community in crisis. We're not lawbreakers... so the police don't feel like they have to make the inroads that they would with other communities," Sager said.

But he added that the Jewish community is just as much a part of the problem.

"We have the blinders on, thinking police work isn't for Jews... Here's what the recruiters think: the Jewish community has... no interest in becoming policemen, so why should we bother?"

Sonia Halpern, an English and writing studies professor at the University of Western Ontario who recently wrote a study about Jews in law enforcement, reported that internationally, significant inroads have been made in recent years by police forces to accommodate Jews and address anti-Semitism both internally and in society, but they're still having difficulty recruiting Jewish officers.

"Combine these issues with the low Jewish population generally, and the fact that, culturally, policing is not generally encouraged within North American Jewry, and we see that Jewish citizens are not as represented by their own people as much as other groups are."

Even Sager is torn about how he would feel if any of his four children followed in his footsteps

"I told my wife that not one of my kids is going to be a policeman. I don't want it for them. I want something better for them. I didn't want them to face danger, and I want them to do better for themselves," he said.

On the other hand, what makes him question his instinct to keep his children from considering careers in law enforcement is that he wouldn't have to worry about them financially.

"I'd worry about their safety, but not financially, and sometimes that's a bigger problem than anything else," Sager said.

"I think if parents knew that their kids could be making six figures almost from the start and be guaranteed a job for the rest of their lives, and a pension, they might look at it differently."

Aside from a few isolated incidents, Sager insisted that police officers today are much more sensitive to minority issues than in the past.

"It's a younger generation, better educated, they've got more life experience... They come from different backgrounds, and the values that they are taught at home are completely different from the values that were taught to the generation that came before them."

In fact, two years ago, Sager led an initiative to obtain and erect a six-foot menorah every Chanukah in front of the 32 Division station near Yonge Street and Finch Avenue, which was supported by his superintendent, Selwyn Fernandes, and his staff.

Halpern agreed that police are being better trained to be more culturally sensitive.

"I think the police realize that it only serves to their benefit and the benefit of the communities. They develop greater respect for the communities they are policing and the community, as a result, develops greater respect for the police. So it's really a win-win for everybody."

In spite of these inroads, Halpern said that based on her research, it doesn't look like Jews are more or less likely as a group to enter the field than in the past.

"But I'd like to get across the idea that so much of Judaism is based on the theme of justice and police work addresses the concerns of justice. Because of the value that police place on saving lives and maintainimg a quality of life for people, it seems to me very consistent with Jewish values," Halpern said.■

Identity plan for Diaspora Jews gets OK

JTA

Israel's government has approved an initiative to strengthen the connection between Israel and world Jewry, as well as to strengthen the Jewish identity of young Diaspora Jews.

The Government of Israel-World Jewry Joint Initiative was approved by government ministers on Sunday.

The comprehensive, multi-year plan will be based on joint initiatives to be developed by the State of Israel and world Jewry, according to the Prime Minister's Office and the Jewish Agency for Israel, which will work in partnership with the government in organizing the initiative.

The total budget to implement the initiative of about $168 million will come one-third from the Israeli government and two-thirds from world Jewry. The Israeli government's contribution is above existing funding for world Jewry programs.

Jewish Agency Chairman Natan Sharansky addressed a government cabinet meeting on Sunday in support of the plan.

"The State of Israel needs a strong Jewish world and the Jewish world needs a strong Israel. This government decision, which comes during a difficult period of budget cuts, is the strongest expression of the centrality of Jewish identity as the cornerstone of Israel-Diaspora relations," Sharansky said in a statement following the vote.

The initiative will work under the auspices of the Ministry of Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs, headed by Naftali Bennett, leader of the Jewish Home party.

The initiative comes following a two-year planning process that involved thousands of Jewish leaders from Israel and around the world. ■

Suspect in museum shooting claims responsibility

JTA

A man arrested on suspicion of killing four people last month at the Jewish Museum of Belgium allegedly claimed responsibility for the attack in a video.

Belgian federal prosecutor Frederic Van Leeuw said Sunday in a news conference in Brussels that a video found after the arrest of Mehdi Nemmouche, 29, at a bus and train station in Marseille May 29, includes his voice claiming responsibility for the May 24 attack and murders. Nemmouche had tried to film the attack, according to Van Leeuw, but the camera failed.

Nemmouche was arrested at Marseille's main train and bus station, Saint-Charles, on May 29 and is currently being held on suspicion of terrorist activity. He arrived in Marseille aboard a bus that left from Amsterdam via Brussels.

According to TF1, a French television broadcaster, Nemmouche was stopped by customs officers performing routine checks. He declined to open his bag, leading the customs officers to evacuate the bus and check the contents of every bag aboard. The weapons found in the man's luggage "were arms of the same type used on May 24 in Brussels," an unnamed source told AFP.

Nemmouche also carried a small, portable video camera and a baseball cap similar to the one that is believed to have been worn by the perpetrator of the Brussels Jewish museum shooting, according to AFP.

> President, CRIF

Also Sunday, Belgian police took two people in for questioning in connection with the investigation into Nemmouche, according to AFP.

Nemmouche became a radical jihadist while serving a sentence in France in 2009 for armed robbery, TF1 reported. He left France for Belgium in 2012 and from there travelled to Syria.

Nemmouche had spent a total of five years in prison from late 2007 to December of 2012, and had visited the United Kingdom, Lebanon, Turkey and Syria after his release. He returned to Europe in March 2014, BFMTV reported Sunday.

Roger Cukierman, president of French Jewry's umbrella organization CRIF, told the British Independent newspaper that it would be a "huge relief" if Nemmouche is found to be the Brussels killer.

"While he was free, another attack was likely," Cukierman said. "It seems that the worst fears of western governments are being realized. The European jihadists in Syria are a time bomb waiting to go off." ■

Zen and the State of Israel

Sagi Melamed

On the evening before Passover, I called H. and after we had wished each other a happy holiday, I posed an open question: "What will be?" H, one of the most senior media people in Israel, sighed and said: "Things are not good in Israel. I don't think it could be worse."

"You've been saying that for nearly 20 years!" I replied.

"You're right," said H, "but this time I think it's really true."

Nowadays I'm hearing more and more pessimistic comments about Israel from Israelis. Many are saying, "Things aren't like they used to be" or "The situation is going downhill" or "It's hard to see any light at the end of the tunnel."

Consider three reasons for these pessimistic assertions.

The first reason is personal. Most such comments are made by older people. Inevitably, the human body has its own dynamic. What was once strong and healthy is less so today. Over time, posture becomes less erect and knees hurt more. Once, running was easy. Today, climbing the stairs is a challenge. Without reading glasses, the words are blurry. As for the future, that, too, does not promise much improvement. So having a sense that the country is deteriorating is also a reflection of a sense of betrayal by one's own body.

The second reason is sectoral. I have not conducted a survey, yet I'm prepared to suggest that complaints about the decline of the country tend to come more from secular Ashkenazim. They were the primary founders of the country, they ruled and led Israel for the first decades of its existence, and their supremacy was gradually taken away from them. The melting pot has done its work. The music that was once dubbed "Mizrahi music" is now mainstream, a Sephardi chief of staff or president is no longer newsworthy, and the ethnic demon became history a long time ago. Anyone who has attended an officers training graduation ceremony recently will have seen how many IDF officers are wearing kippot. So the complaints of secular Ashkenazim about the country are also complaints about the hegemony that was taken from them.

The third reason is national, an undermining of the basic belief of Israelis that "the sun will come out tomorrow," as the song from Annie says. This is due to several parallel processes: economic ones, such as the high cost of housing alongside the consumer appetites of Israelis, which are growing out of all proportion to productivity or their ability to support those desires; and political and regional processes, the foremost of which is losing the hope of reaching peace with our neighbours, undermining the belief that the next generation will no longer need to fight.

So much for explaining the pessimism. So what about the optimism? Worrying about the future is understandable and maybe even part of the Jewish character. However, if we look at the current situation of Israel in general and of Jews around the world in particular, using the lenses of Zen, which focus on the here and now, things have clearly never been better!

In other words, if we can overcome the nostalgic tendency to glorify times gone by and to doubt that "the sun will come out tomorrow," we can see that it would be hard to point to a time in history, from the patriarch Abraham until the present day, when things were better for the Jewish People. A very brief summary:

A sovereign state; a strong Jewish army; a stable economy; innovation and creativity; weakening of the country's enemies; and equal rights and opportunities for Jews almost anywhere they live – and that's just a partial list.

To close, a quote from Albert Schweitzer: "To the question of whether I am a pessimist or an optimist, I answer that my knowledge is pessimistic, but my will and my hope are optimistic." ■

German car maker Audi reveals Nazi past

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

German car giant Audi's predecessor company used slave labourers from concentration camps during World War II on a massive scale, a new report has found.

An historical investigation commissioned by the company – the last German auto company to do so, preceded by Volkswagen, Daimler and BMW – found that when Audi was operating under the name Auto Union, it struck a deal with the SS in which more than 3,700 inmates from Nazi concentration camps were put to work for the company.

The 500-page report, authored by historians Martin Kukowski and Rudolf Boch and published May 26, revealed that the Nazi SS divisions built seven labour camps for this purpose.

Another 16,500 labourers – not interned in concentration camps – also were made to work for the car company in the Saxon cities of Zwickau and Chemnitz, in addition to 18,000 at a plant in Bavaria where more than 4,000 died, the report noted.

"More than 20,000 forced labourers were used in the production of Auto Union in their Saxon works, including almost one-fifth from concentration camps," said the study authors, who also found that disabled workers were sent to concentration camps to be executed.

During the war, some of Audi's plants were turned over for military production of tanks and aircraft engines.

Kukowski and Boch, basing their report on access to Audi archives, said that Auto Union's management bore "moral responsibility" for the exploitation of slave labour, focusing particularly on founder, Dr. Richard Bruhn, a Nazi party member.

Bruhn was Auto Union's chairman of the board from 1932, when the company was founded, until 1945, and again after the company was re-established after the war. Bruhn, heralded on Audi's website as the "Father of the Auto Union," died in 1964.

The study's findings came as a shock to its current management.

"I'm very shocked by the scale of the involvement of the former Auto Union leadership in the system of forced and slave labour," Audi works council head Peter Mosch told Wirtschaftswoche, a German business news magazine.

"I was not aware of the extent [of this involvement]," he added.

Auto Union merged with Volkswagen, Audi's parent company, in 1965, dropping the original name in 1985 after a merger.

According to the Daily Mail, a decade ago, Audi paid millions into a fund set up by the German auto industry to compensate Nazi slave labourers and their descendants.

The president of Audi Canada did not respond to requests for comment as The CJN went to press. ■

World leaders urged to ignore new Palestinian unity government

JTA

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu criticized European acceptance of a Palestinian unity government just hours before its new ministers were sworn in.

"It is surprising for me that European governments, which vehemently condemned the Brussels shooting, talk collegially or even in a friendly tone about the Palestinian unity government with Hamas," Netanyahu said Monday morning at a meeting of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee.

"This is a terrorist organization which undertakes criminal attacks and boasts about them."

The Palestinian unity government was sworn in Monday by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in the West Bank city of Ramallah, the capital of the Palestinian Authority.

The ceremony was almost delayed by last-minute fighting over the configuration of the new cabinet and a threat of boycott by Hamas.

Israel stopped actively looking for ways to continue American-backed peace talks with the Palestinians after the announcement that Abbas' Fatah party had agreed to form a unity government with Hamas.

Netanyahu urged world leaders not to recognize the new Palestinian unity government.

"I call on all responsible elements in the international community not to run to recognize the Palestinian government of which Hamas is a part and which rests on Hamas. Hamas is a terrorist organization that calls for the destruction of Israel, and the international community must not embrace it. This will not strengthen peace; it will strengthen terrorism," Netanyahu said Sunday at the start of the regular weekly cabinet meeting.

Abbas said on Saturday during a meeting in Ramallah with pro-Palestinian activists from abroad that Israel has threatened to boycott the new government.

The U.S. State Department on Friday said that the Obama administration had not yet officially recognized a new Palestinian unity government and that Prime Minister Rami Hamdallah has not been invited to the White House to meet with U.S. officials, despite claims to that effect by Palestinian authorities.

"There has been no invitation issued to Prime Minister Hamdallah. As we've said all along, we'll not make decisions until we see the final formation of the interim government," State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki said during a briefing with reporters. ■

Thousands march in NYC Israel parade

Tens of thousands marched in New York in the Celebrate Israel Parade, which is marking its 50th anniversary. Organizers had expected some 35,000 participants in Sunday's parade up Fifth Avenue in Manhattan. This year's parade was the focus of intra-communal controversy, with some right-wing activists objecting to the participation of several left-wing Jewish groups, including the New Israel Fund. Among those participating were more than 80 Jews from around New York who are planning to make aliyah in the coming months.

Jewish Life

The story of DAVY THE PUNK

Canadian folk musician Bob Bossin stands in front of a backdrop of him as a young boy with his parents, Marcia and Davy Bossin during his performance. BARRY PRICE PHOTO

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Canadian folk musician Bob Bossin has spent much of his life searching for his father Davy Bossin who died in 1963, when Bob was a teenager. While he remembers a quiet, conservative man who was also an arresting storyteller, Davy was better known as one of Toronto's most wanted men.

Davy's Jewish pals and the local authorities knew of Bossin's dad as Davy the Punk. When the son first heard of this nom de guerre in the mid-1970s, Bossin began an investigation that would define the rest of his life.

In 2014, that search for his father has turned into a one-man show that Bossin is now touring across Canada. The show, Davy the Punk, features original songs and electrifying stories about the underbelly of Toronto the Good that few history books mention.

"When I turned 60, I had this little epiphany," Bossin says. "I said if there's something you've always wanted to do and haven't started it yet, when exactly do you think you're going to. For me, that was to write about my father's life."

Bossin spent eight years working on the production ; the first two years doing research, the next six writing the music and bringing the various story strands together.

The show is a tribute to both sides of Bossin's dad: the loyal patriarch who set his criminal life aside to raise his son right, as well as that "punk" who was notorious to Toronto police.

Davy the Punk also features Bossin's original music. He says that this was the first time he wrote about his father directly in his music. One of the show's tunes, Scatter My Ashes on the Racetrack, came from one of his father's demands to Bossin's mom for when he died.

Bossin, now 68 and a B.C. resident, says he grew to adore storytelling from his father, who loved to tell tall tales of his life on the street to close friends and family.

In Davy the Punk, Bossin touches on his father's Jewish upbringing. In the 1920s, Jews were mostly barred from getting white-collar jobs in Toronto and many Jews ended up in the gambling business, which was illegal.

Davy grew to be a leader in the city's gambling enterprise. He came under the watch of Toronto authorities when he started a race wire, an up-to-the-second soundboard of information from the horse racing tracks.

In 1940, police raided Davy's race wire operation in what was, at that time, the biggest police raid in the city's history.

"The prevailing theory was... if they could knock out the race wire, they could stop organized crime in its tracks," Bossin says, noting that the theory was far from true.

Davy may have been notorious by the standards of the local police, but he was a beloved member of Toronto's Jewish community. Since he got into the gambling business before the Great Depression, he was quite wealthy during years when his friends were in financial strain.

"He was extraordinarily generous," Bossin says. "He would take 30 people out to dinner and he was a very honest man. What he did was illegal but in every other way, it was honourable."

To track down details about his dad's past, Bossin spoke to old relatives and some of his dad's acquaintances, although only a few came forward with details. He also dug up dirt by looking through newspaper archives and Freedom of Information requests.

Davy the Punk has music, as well as comedy and Canadian history. Bossin presents his father's story and performs music while wearing his father's tie. Meanwhile, Bossin released a book about his father, also called Davy the Punk, which came out in March.

Those familiar with Bossin's career as a folk singer and songwriter, most notably as a member of the influential Canadian group Stringband in the 1970s and 1980s, will likely enjoy his new material.

Bossin says that his mother, the late Marcia Bossin, told him that his dad left the gambling business to protect his son, saying he didn't want Bob to grow up with a dad who had a criminal lifestyle. For the rest of Davy's life, he was a booking agent at Southern Ontario nightclubs.

"I see every year more and more of how he was in me, so I think the influence is profound," says Bossin, who later named his son Davy.

"There's a mountain of information that I'll simply never know. But that's probably true of everybody and their father." ■

The one-man show will stop in Vancouver (June 3-7), Toronto (June 10-14), as well as the fringe festivals in Ottawa (June 19-29) and Winnipeg (July 16-27). Bossin will also perform "Davy the Punk" at Concordia University in Montreal on June 30.

Musical challenges audience to discuss inclusion

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A chance encounter with a quadriplegic led Michael Rubenfeld to create The Book of Judith, a musical that questions commonly held ideas about disability, running at the Ability Centre in Whitby June 12-14.

Created with Sarah Garton Stanley and Judith Snow, the musical came about when Rubenfeld met Snow, a visual artist and advocate for inclusion communities. The trio have worked together extensively to explore Snow's life as a quadriplegic.

"I met Judith in 2005. A good friend of mine, Caleb Yong, was working as her personal assistant and approached me because Judith was looking for a lover and he asked to see if he could help her find one," says Rubenfeld. "He asked me if I knew of anyone. I was blown away by the question because it was weird to be asked. I couldn't think of anyone who would be interested in being her lover because she was a quadriplegic.

"My answer to him was, I don't know but I would love to make a piece of theatre about it and explore that question theatrically. We met and she asked me if I had considered anything about her beyond the fact that she was quadriplegic and I realized I hadn't. At that point she said she would let me do this play, but that we had to do it together and that is when our relationship began."

The play, which was staged in Toronto in 2009, challenges audiences to confront their own assumptions surrounding disability, and engage in a conversation. Whitby will mark the end of the play's four-city Ontario tour, starring Rubenfeld, and featuring Snow, and actor Alex Bulmer, along with a 20-person inclusive choir local to each area the play is performed in.

Rubenfeld says the story is about him making a piece of theatre with Judith that fails and the reasons for why he did. "I play myself in the show, but I play a kind of version of myself that is stuck in this idea that because my life was changed by Judith, then now I have the capacity to change other people's lives with Judith's story. The play is set up as a story I'm going to tell about me and Judith, but what we slowly come to realize is that what we are actually getting is my version because Judith quits because she didn't like the way I was behaving. So, in my pursuit of telling this story about inclusion I end up excluding her from the process so that I can be front and centre and tell her story. She ultimately does come back and make the show with us," Rubenfeld says.

"Most people would assume they are inclusive, myself included. But, what I realized through my work with Judith is that she embraces other people's ignorance and allows space for them to make mistakes and then to grow and learn with her. As a result, she's built relationships with people all over the world."

Snow is also founding director of Laser Eagles, an organization that creates opportunities for artists with limited mobility and speech to explore their artistic vision.

The Book of Judith is staged outside in a tent and is treated like a religious revival.

Inspired by The Book of Judith's core message of inclusion, a day-long symposium on June 13 will be held at the Abilities Centre in Whitby to examine collaboration and inclusion within the performing arts. Artists, arts professionals and organizations committed to incorporating inclusive thinking and practice through their creation process, programming and educational initiatives will be in attendance.

The play is produced by Selfconscious Theatre in partnership with Abilities Centre and the Theatre Centre. For tickets visit www.bookofjudith.com, or by phone at 905-665-8500. The play boasts original music by Andrew Penner, under the musical direction of Paula Wolfson. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

ANNE DUBLIN LAUNCHES NEW YOUNG ADULT NOVEL AT HOLY BLOSSOM, JUNE 8

Anne Dublin, the award-winning author of books for children and teens, is nothing if not prolific. Her works have included biographies on Toronto social activist June Callwood, Montreal Jewish athlete Bobbie Rosenfeld and Anne of Green Gables writer Lucy Maud Montgomery. She's also written historical novels set in Hamburg in the early 18th century (The Baby Experiment), in Poland in 1937 (The Orphan Rescue), and in Toronto in 1954 (Written On The Wind, about Hurricane Hazel).

Dublin's newest historical novel is Stealing Time (ages 10 and up), about young Jonah Wiley who steals an antique pocket watch and is hurled back in time with his stepbrother to Egypt, China, France and other places. The book launch is at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., June 8, 1:30 p.m. Free admission.

• Active 55+ presents Art Appreciation with art history teacher Osnat Lippa, with a focus on Francis Bacon and Henry Moore – Postwar Perspectives on the Human Form. (These artists are currently on exhibit at the Art Gallery of Ontario.) Preregister $20, or $12 per session at the door. Miles Nadal JCC, Tuesdays June 10 and 17, 1 to 2:30 p.m. 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

• Singer Gillian Stecyk presents Arias & Anecdotes, an "afternoon at the opera" featuring an array of arias and fascinating historical anecdotes about the operas and their composers, with selected choruses sung by the MNJCC's Daytime Choir. Miles Nadal JCC, June 11, 1:30, $4 drop-in. 416-924-6211, ext. 154.

The Israel Museum in Jerusalem recently acquired Gustav Klimt's Die Medizin. It is his only remaining oil study for a controversial series of monumental paintings created for the University of Vienna's Great Hall. The painting, completed in 1898, is one of three allegorical panels representing the themes of enlightenment Klimt developed. The others were destroyed by retreating Nazis in 1945.

Arts in Brief

• Holocaust survivor Sidney Zoltak returns to his childhood town of Siemiatycze, Poland and is reunited with members of the Krinsky family who provided underground shelter for 14 months; then he joins thousands of people on the March of the Living. It's all part of a broadcast to air on CBC's The National on June 4; it should also be online. www.marchofthelliving.org

• The 2014 Luminato Festival features many theatre, dance, music, film and other arts events. Runs June 5 to 16 at venues around town. www.luminatofestival.com

Bonert wins fiction prize at Jewish Book Awards

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like sunlight diffracted through a prism into a spectrum of colours, the books honoured at the 2014 Stan and Helen Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards represent a diverse assortment of places across the Diaspora, including South Africa, Belarus, Ukraine, Salonika, and Central and Eastern Europe.

Kenneth Bonert took the coveted fiction prize for his acclaimed novel The Lion Seeker, which documents the life of Jewish characters in Johannesburg, who are originally from a shtetl in Lithuania.

Bonert, who was born in South Africa and came to Toronto in 1989 at age 17, based his characters on his family's past. "I found when I started to write that a lot of the voices of my relatives and the people I grew up with were strongly embedded in my mind," he told The CJN prior to receiving the award last week in a ceremony at the Toronto Public Library's Bram & Bluma Appel Salon.

"I think the first 18 years of your life are probably the ones that make the most vivid impression. And a lot of writers tend to go back to that period as a sort of wellspring for their imagination. That was certainly the case with this book."

Although she is a New York-based American whose book focuses on the experiences of the Jews in a predominantly Jewish city in Greece, Renee Levine Melammed won the biography/memoir prize for An Ode to Salonika: The Ladino Verses of Bouena Sarfatty.

The Canadian connection comes through her subject: Salonika-born Bouena Sarfatty Garfinkle, who lived in Montreal for more than half a century after the war. During the Holocaust the Nazis deported and killed almost all of Salonika's 60,000 Jews. Sarfatty Garfinkle gave Levine Melammed hundreds of her Ladino poems memorializing the community she knew, and the latter translated them and put them into an historical context.

The scholarship prize went to the chronicler of another Nazi-decimated community. Dr. Albert Kaganovitch, originally of Russia and now of Winnipeg, wrote The Long Life and Swift Death of Jewish Rechitsa in Russian but won the prize for the English translation.

As in years past, Holocaust themes dominated the awards. The prize in youth literature went to Winnipeg author Carol Matas for Dear Canada, Pieces of the Past: The Holocaust Diary of Rose Rabinowitz, while Toronto author Ken Setterington won the Holocaust literature prize for Branded by the Pink Triangle.

Although Setterington isn't Jewish and his book has no explicitly Jewish theme, it won because it chronicles the Nazi persecution of gay men, who were incarcerated in Nazi work camps and forced to wear pink triangles.

The Holocaust also resonates through Correspondences featuring poems by Anne Michaels and portraits by Bernice Eisenstein, each of whom was cited for the poetry award.

Jeffrey Veidlinger's In the Shadow of the Shtetl presents a portrait of Ukraine as told by local Jewish survivors of the prewar years, the Holocaust and the Stalinist era. Veidlinger interviewed more than 400 elderly Ukrainian Jews, many of whom were still living in their native shtetlach.

The prize for Yiddish translation went to Frieda Forman, editor of The Exile Book of Yiddish Women Writers and the prize for Jewish thought and culture to Josh Lambert for Unclean Lips: Obscenity, Jews and American Culture.

Over 26 years, some $104,000 in prize money has been handed out to 194 winners. ■

Two books by Toronto authors

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Now and Then Books, a Toronto-based publisher is to be commended for bringing readers A Basket of Apples, an anthology of six thematically connected short stories by the acclaimed writer Shirley Faessler who died in 1997.

The stories were first published in 1998 by McClelland and Stewart. As a way of re-acquainting new generations of readers to Faessler and to the vibrant Yiddish-speaking enclave in the Kensington Market area of downtown Toronto in the late 1920s and 1930s, Now and Then Books has reissued the collection in an esthetically pleasing booklet of some 180 pages.

The stories are intertwined. They appear to be autobiographical, depicting different pieces of the jumbled jigsaw that formed the author's colourful family. With unabashedly bold writing, she deftly, pointedly, captured the cacophonous, mostly hard-edged, tangled-up, Jewish immigrant life that she remembered growing up.

Faessler introduces us to a roughhouse assortment of vivid, memorable characters. There are no wilting, diminished personalities in these stories. All of them leave a dent in the wall of the reader's memory bank. In one story we meet the author's step-uncle, Yankev, and his wife, Henye. In another story, we meet the author's father, Avrom Mendel and her stepmother, Chayele. Faessler describes the respective spouse's feelings for one another in pitiable and painful detail. In the other stories, we meet a former employer from the author's young adulthood, school chums, street personalities and countryside rakes. The characters are remarkably convincing and emotionally evocative.

Faessler is greatly adept at creating believable dialogue. She writes scenes of high drama and emotional gravity through authentic-sounding conversations among the new arrivals who are her family members, friends and the overflowing humanity of the neighbourhood in which she lived.

Thus, for example, Mr. Layevsky, the author's boss at a take-away dry good store, scolds the narrator when she brings a book to the office: "No, no, no. Don't bring no more a book to the office. It's not nice a customer comes in and the girl sits with a book." Many of us can hear Mr. Layevsky's facsimile of spoken English echoing in the missing voices we can recall from our own past.

Faessler's ability to establish character and content through conversation is astonishing. But the characters she establishes are mostly gruff, harsh, lacking in warmth or compassionate sentiment and, at times, even cruel. To be sure, there are occasional moments in the stories of loving and humane interactions, but these are at the periphery.

Roughly hewn personages and the brash, stark, sometime brutal way they encounter life does make compelling reading. But one is left wondering whether these were the sum total of the author's recollections of life in the Yiddish-speaking world of her family.

Were there no moments in her world – as there were in the Yiddish-speaking immigrant world in which countless others were raised in Toronto – of thoughtful gesture, sweet song and tender caress?

A Basket of Apples is indeed compelling reading, but it leaves us feeling and regretting this absence in Faessler's portrayal of her immigrant world.

By contrast, Fiona Gold Kroll has written a gripping story, which in profound manner is itself a thoughtful gesture and a tender caress to the memory of someone she never met, namely her great-uncle, Benjamin Albaum.

A Stone for Benjamin is a moving testament to the author's iron will and determination to track down all the details of his life, despite the inevitable sorrow in knowing her great-uncle's ultimate fate during World War II.

A Stone for Benjamin
Fiona Gold Kroll

Iguana Press

Kroll writes her story as a resolute detective piecing together, clue by partial clue, the fragmented story of her grandmother's brother. What happened to him and to his family after he left Poland in the 1920s to settle in Paris? Her tale began with a photograph clutched in her hand and ended with an indelible imprint seared into her heart.

"My search for Benjamin has changed me in profound ways," Kroll writes in the epilogue. "Every one of the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust deserves a place in our memory and in our hearts. Benjamin Albaum is one of them and he will stay in my heart forever."

Kroll writes in a forthright manner: spare with narrative, precise with description. For example, while peering out of the window of the plane on her way to Krakow, she observes, "All I can see are quiet country roads cutting through emerald green rolling hills. Fields are lush and horses graze peacefully in the bucolic landscape. It is a stark contrast to the circumstances 65 years earlier when Nazis surrounded terrified Polish Jews, some of them my family, who struggled to flee their assassins."

The author's quest was more than a personal search for historic certainty, although that would have been sufficient justification for her exemplary enterprise. It was an individual's attestation – achieved through tears and fears, courage, strength and dignity - that it is the sanctity of all human life that counts above all else in this world.

"Now I am beginning to understand what is driving my obsession," Kroll wrote after receiving some information at her home in Toronto from the archives at Auschwitz. "Every piece of information about Benjamin that I gather helps negate the Nazi doctrine of dehumanizing their victims. I want to erase the idea of Benjamin as a number. He should be remembered as a human being, a man with feelings and a man who lived life and cared deeply for his wife and children. I want to give Benjamin back his life."

Alas, Kroll could not give her great-uncle back his life. But she did restore the memory of his life to those who live after him. And if we could only follow Kroll's example – not in seeking out the details of the way they were killed but in remembering and recalling and then conveying the details of the way they lived – we too will have helped sanctify, for eternity, the memory of those who perished in the Holocaust. ■

Setting medication dosages is like making gefilte fish

Dr. Michael Gordon

When we think about the relationship between food and medication, what usually comes to mind are those little sticky warnings on bottles that tell you whether you should take a medication with or without food, whether the food might interfere with the absorption of the medication, or whether your appetite might be affected by it. It's not uncommon for people to have problems with certain medications that have nausea as a side effect. At the extremes, there are some very potent medications whose most significant side effect isn't just nausea, but actual vomiting. For them, special steps are often required for the medication to be tolerated.

I was thinking about these issues after speaking with a concerned daughter about the challenges she faced in finding the right combination of medications to address serious behavioural problems associated with her mother's late-stage dementia. Often these behavioural problems – which physicians call BPSD, behavioural and psychiatric symptoms of dementia, and might include severe agitation or paranoid suspicions and hallucinations – can make it impossible for a person to be cared for in a facility or at home.

As I was explaining the principles of changing the doses of some medications her mother was using and heard about the daughter's difficulty in getting medical advice, I realized that giving the daughter the means, understanding and permission to change her mother's dosages within a range of acceptable therapeutic parameters would let her adjust her mother's medication without feeling she might be doing something "wrong" while awaiting medical or other professional confirmation.

Passover was coming up, so I started to explain the principles that physicians use to reach the best dose of a medication, within a recommended range, by recalling how my maternal grandmother made her famous gefilte fish.

In those days, the traditional Passover dish would always be made from scratch, and in our family, never bought in jars (which had just recently come into being – it was before frozen products became available). After she cleaned and eviscerated the freshly bought fish, my mother would chop it in a large wooden bowl using her hand steel chopper, which I think she got from her own mother. Most importantly, I recalled, after she chopped and added the spices, she would taste the raw mix, then add something more and taste again.

(An aside: this practice of eastern European Jewish women became famous in the annals of clinical epidemiology during the early 20th century, when outbreaks of fish tapeworm – diphyllobothrium – among this population was eventually traced to the gefilte fish-making process. The raw fish was the benign carrier of the parasite, which wasn't so benign when it entered the human digestive system.)

I explained to the daughter that a medication dose starts with the standard recipe. Then, after "simmering" for a few days, depending on her mother's symptoms, the dose would either be increased incrementally by amounts I detailed to her, or if side effects became pronounced, the dose could be decreased, also incrementally, all the time "tasting" the result of the change.

The next stage might include the addition of another medication to the one being taken, using the cooking analogy on how to add and adjust medications as one might season the gefilte fish mix.

The daughter had a good laugh as we talked, and by the end, I could feel her anxiety subside. She agreed to let me know if the "recipe" resulted in an acceptable outcome, or if we needed to explore something else entirely.

The food-medication connection is profound on many levels, both clinically and in how we manage medications with comfort and security. ■

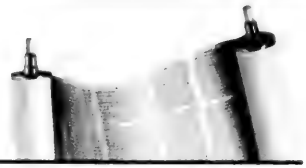
Beha'alotcha | Numbers 8.1 - 12.16



Yacov Fruchter says Jews could never truly accept the Torah until they ceased being slaves
Rabbi Shalom Spira argues rotating communal responsibilities is the key to a healthy society
Rachael Turkienicz suggests Judaism's covenant requires active rejection of the alternatives

Yacov Fruchter

Beha'alotcha, meaning "as you light the candles," the third Torah portion of the book of Bamidbar, is read in the same week that we celebrate Shavuot and the gift that is the Torah.

The midbar, the desert, is often described as "the wilderness." This was a time when the Jewish People were in a state of unknown after leaving Egypt, feeling confused and out of sorts despite their new freedom. We all have moments when we feel a bit lost, when we're unsure of each next step or action. The children of Israel complained a lot in the desert, but wouldn't you if you spent 40 years walking in circles?

Their entire journey in the desert was for one purpose: to change their way of thinking. Though they had received the Torah and were expected to fulfill the commandments, without a change in thought and without a change in their thought habits, they would forever see themselves as worthless slaves who didn't deserve any better. As slaves, or with their enslaved thoughts, they could never truly accept the Torah, God or their role in the world.

I recently attended an incredible lecture by Rae Ringel at the Collaboratory, a conference for innovative Jewish organizations in New York City, and she ended her talk with a powerful quote from Henry David Thoreau: "As a single footstep will not make a path on the earth, so a single thought will not make a pathway in the mind. To make a deep physical path, we walk again and again. To make a deep mental path, we must think over and over the kind of thoughts we wish to dominate our lives."

As we prepare for Shavuot, we need to reignite our passion for Jewish life, refine our thoughts and reinforce them with positive action over and over again. Chag Samayach and best of thoughts! ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And Joshua... answered saying, 'My master, Moses, exterminate them.'" (Numbers 11:28) The Gemara, Sanhedrin 17a, explains that Joshua advised Moses to appoint Eldad and Medad to a position of communal authority, the emotional aggravation of which would surely kill them. Tosafot interpret this figuratively: since prophecy requires a state of personal joy, Eldad and Medad would be unable to continue to prophesy while aggravated.

Maharsha, however, questions Tosafot on the grounds that Joshua didn't realize that Eldad and Medad were true prophets. Maharsha's proposed alternative is cryptically phrased, but he appears to hint that Joshua was literally seeking their death, and indeed so indicates the Sifrei to Numbers 11:28. Since the Gemara in Pesachim 87b declares that "political office buries its holders," the cause and effect become comprehensible.

If our hypothesis is correct, it would shed light on a mysterious Rema in Shulchan Aruch Yoreh De'ah 339:1, where the latter forbids placing synagogue keys under the pillow of a moribund patient (gossess). Maharsha reveals that communal responsibility is pathologically stressful (and, presumably, may not be imposed upon a gossess). Possession of keys is symbolic of assuming responsibility, pursuant to Pesachim 4a, that in a rental relationship, the party which has the keys at nightfall on the 14th of Nissan is obligated to search for chametz.

Rabbi Shmuel Wosner (Teshuvot Shevet ha-Levi 1:40) endeavours to reconcile Tosafot with the ruling of Shulchan Aruch Orach Chaim 93:4 that one may commence praying while in the midst of a communal responsibility. Rabbi Wosner answers that although a workaholic will indeed be negatively impacted by incessant communal duty, an occasional communal duty can actually energize its well-balanced trustee with joy and the ability to pray. This, then, is the key (no pun intended) to managing a healthy society: rotating communal responsibilities, so that everyone's longevity benefits. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

The holiday of Shavuot, the Revelation at Sinai and the receiving of the Torah are simultaneously an acceptance of a new vision and a rejection of the old.

When Moses climbs Mount Sinai, we're told that the mountain itself became alive. As Moses ascends, he's hidden from view, and the nation watches him disappear into the mountain. To us, this is a magnificent event, but to them, it's a familiar one.

The mountain is shaped like a pyramid. The pharaohs of Egypt would die, be placed inside the pyramid and emerge from the top, ascending to return as a god and watch over Egypt. The Israelites likely believed they were witnessing such an event. Moses, their royal Egyptian Jewish leader, raised in the palace, disappeared into the pyramid/mountain and they awaited his ascent to the gods. But this last part was missing, and after waiting and waiting, they decide to build an Egyptian god, a Golden Calf.

The visceral reaction of God and Moses, as well as the civil war that followed, was more than a punishment – it was an uprooting. Israel hadn't left Egypt behind, so it couldn't embrace the new vision of covenant.

Ancient Egypt was a culture that embraced death and viewed it as the ultimate achievement. Judaism is a culture that embraces life and celebrates it. Preserving life trumps the commandments. We drink to life, and we're taught to always prefer joy to sadness. Some opinions say many of our commandments are an active rejection of Egypt. For example, Egyptians would shave all the hair on their bodies, while we're forbidden to shave our heads or faces.

When we celebrate Shavuot, we remind ourselves the covenant is not only defined by what we bring into our lives, but also by what we keep out. We don't merely accept Torah, we actively reject its alternative. ■

Nir Barkat: Preparing Jerusalem for the next 100 years

ygoldstein@thecjn.ca

Since winning the mayoralty of Jerusalem in 2008, Nir Barkat has embarked on a number of bold initiatives to rejuvenate the city. By most accounts, he has been successful, establishing the capital as a cultural, economic and political hub, while cracking down on crime and corruption.

A year into his second term, Barkat, 54, spoke to The CJN ahead of a June 8 visit to Toronto about his plans for the city and the strong bond between Jerusalem and Canada.

What are the differences between your first and second mandates? What did you learn the first time around that helps you this time?

Entering my first term, the city was in quite a negative state. After five years of hard work, the economy is booming and our municipal budget has grown by double digits four years in a row. Crime rates are going down and good things are happening. So we have entered the second term with very strong backwind and lots of things on the ground. Because of the success of the first term, I believe we will accomplish even more this time.

Tell us about the rejuvenation projects you've undertaken.

We have more than quadrupled the number of cultural events in the city. We've launched many new projects, like the light festival in the Old City that drew 300,000 visitors in a week. We had the Formula One road show, with almost 300,000 spectators in two days. Our cultural organizations have moved from survival to creative mode and are doing much better than in the past.

Tourism is up – hotel occupancy rose from 40 per cent to around 70 per cent, and we have investments in the pipeline to create more than 10,000 hotel rooms.

Nir Barkat

When you look at all the parameters of a healthy economy, we're headed in the right direction. There are many cranes in the air. We also see progress in high school matriculation results. We've moved from below the national average to above it. And the number of people in youth movements went from 25 to 44 per cent.

What are the next steps in your rejuvenation project?

We have mega-projects in the pipeline. We finished the first light rail line in the city, and we're deep into developing two additional light rail lines that I believe we'll start working on as soon as this year. We have the fast train from Tel Aviv in the works, which will be ready in the first half of 2018.

We are building a very large business district at the entrance to the city. There will be 13 towers of 35 stories, with 11 million square feet of office space, hotel rooms and commerce.

We're building the largest sports complex in the country, which includes the expanded Teddy soccer stadium and a new arena, the largest in the country.

When you look at Jerusalem five, seven, 10 years down the road, it will be a fundamentally different city – much more connected with public transport, with a big push for the business sector, hotel industry, culture and sports.

We're positioning Jerusalem for the next 50 to 100 years.

Why do you believe government ministries should be based in Jerusalem? And why do you think the decision to move them there has been stalled?

The law in Israel requires all national offices to be in the capital. In the last few decades, there has been a slow decline in the fulfillment of the law. The national government should lead by example in obeying the law. By not having government ministry offices in Jerusalem, you are actually weakening the city. I believe in the next few years when we develop the new business district, we will see swifter and faster movement of more government offices to Jerusalem.

Why have you taken a stand against partitioning Jerusalem?

Jerusalem was never and must never be divided into tribes. There's only one way for the city to function, both ideologically and practically, and that is as a united city. There's no city in the world that has stayed functional while being divided. They either become dysfunctional or reunite. So why go there in the first place? Ideologically it will never work. Practically there are no good examples.

With the news that one of your predecessors, Ehud Olmert, is going to jail for corruption, how can the Israeli political class restore the faith of voters?

The fact my two predecessors disobeyed the law is sad for Jerusalem. However, since I took office, I've made some dramatic changes in the way I manage the municipality. We opened up all committees. We have proposed that all municipal planning processes be totally transparent and open to public debate. We have dramatically fixed the way we do business. My message to the public is that they can trust the municipal government to be honest and ethical and to serve the residents. I'm very happy that Israel has proven that nobody is above the law.

How does Canada House contribute to Jerusalem? What does it say about the relationship between our two countries?

Canadians have a high degree of commitment to the mutual goals of our two peoples. Outside Israel, Canadians are the most committed to the future of our country. Canada House focuses on one of the key elements of our future: how to keep young people in Jerusalem. It's had a huge impact in understanding how to do that, which is critical to the success of the city. It's building future leadership and strengthening Jerusalem today.

How would you characterize the security situation in Jerusalem?

When I fly to America, I pray before I get on the airplane. Our murder rate is one per 200,000 people every year. That's probably 10 times better than any average American city, and I would guess it's better than Toronto, too. We are one of the safest cities in the world, with one-third the crime of Tel Aviv and one-tenth of any American city. If you come and walk the streets, you will feel extremely secure. ■

150 years since a Jewish artist for all reasons

Backstory

JAIME OKSEMBERG

May 2 marked the 150th anniversary of the death of Jacob Liebmann Beer, better known as Giacomo Meyerbeer.

He was one of the most popular opera composers of the 19th and part of the 20th centuries, although his reputation had to withstand the contempt of some critics and fellow musicians who accused him of using the wealth of his Jewish family to influence opera managers in his favour.

Yet his advancement as a musician, starting with a precocious talent, giving piano concerts as a child, followed the ways of that era. Studies in his native country of Germany and also in Italy, using his experiences there to create a more spectacular type of opera, led to an appointment as kapellmeister (music director) in Berlin.

His new approach and the themes he used required elaborate settings, and he found a perfect place for them in the Paris Opera, with its advanced staging resources, where his works were performed for many years, starting with Robert le diable in 1831 and others like Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, L'Etoile du Nord and L'Africaine, all to great acclaim.

An opposing minority didn't agree, though. His growing success made his adversaries even harsher, disapproving of his operas as being not only too grandiose, but also vulgar, perhaps because his music had transcended the concert venues and was played by military bands, dance hall orchestras, and not just individual pieces, but whole potpourris made with them.

In time, criticism became aimed more directly at his Judaism. Musician-turned-critic Theodor Uhlig, later a Richard Wagner follower, elaborated about "the propaganda of the Hebrew art taste" and said that Meyerbeer "lacked a fatherland." Composer Robert Schumann, referring to one of Meyerbeer's operas, wrote that listening to it, he tried in vain to find "a persistently pure thought, a truly Christian sentiment. It is all contrived hypocrisy."

Years after Meyerbeer's death, French composer Hector Berlioz, refreshing an old accusation, wrote that the formerly Jewish poet Heinrich Heine believed that

> His life, both personally and artistically, could have been much easier had he renounced his faith, as other Jewish artists of his epoch did before he died, Meyerbeer paid the authorities of the Paris Opera in advance – in effect bribing them – in order that they would continue to stage his works.

Then Richard Wagner himself came to the fore and called Meyerbeer, among his mildest slurs, "a Jewish banker who happened to compose operas," even though Meyerbeer had helped him to stage his first operas, Rienzi and The Flying Dutchman, and also with personal loans. It's unclear what made Wagner such an adversary – it may have been Meyerbeer's refusal to lend him more money – but besides attacking him, Wagner went after Jews in general, publishing Das Judenthum in der Musik (Jewishness in Music).

All that hostility, together with increasing production costs, resulted in Meyerbeer's operas being less frequently staged, and his popularity dropped considerably. Then the Nazis banned his and all other Jewish composers' music, and his operas are seldom performed today.

His life, both personally and artistically, could have been much easier had he renounced his faith, as other Jewish artists of his epoch did, however he remained always a proud Jew. Giacomo is the Italian translation of Jacob, and Meyer was his grandfather's middle name. He kept Jewish traditions, maintaining contacts with Jewish communities and taking part in the collection of liturgical music for services in a Paris synagogue. He proved that under trying circumstances, artists can succeed without having to give up their Yiddishkeit or Sephardi heritage. ■

Rodrigues Blueberry Wine a hidden gem

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There's a unique kosher Canadian wine waiting for you at the LCBO.

But it's still one of the best kept secrets in the country.

Rodrigues Blueberry Wine, made from 100 per cent wild blueberries, is a versatile and natural drink sourced from Markland, N.L.

"Anyone who's visited Newfoundland knows that if you go off the beaten path and try and walk through the shrub, you're basically walking through patches of low-to-the-ground blueberry bushes," said Laura Higgins, CEO of Amethyst Wine Agency.

Higgins has been the one putting the blueberry wine, created by Rodrigues, in the LCBO in Ontario, but sometimes where it lands on the shelves is a mystery.

"There are [many] sections for Canadian wine, but there's no section for fruit wine," said Higgins of the off-dry wine. "Sometimes they'll put this wine either into the fortified section, though it's not like port, or they put it into a dessert wine section.

"Part of the misconception about this wine [results from] where the LCBO houses it on their shelf."

But for those who live in more Jewish areas, it might be a little easier to find.

"Luckily, in the last five years, they have created distinctive kosher sections within the stores," Higgins said. "Wherever there is a kosher section, Rodrigues Blueberry Wine is usually put there, but not always."

Finding it in the store is sometimes like searching through those Newfoundland shrubs for the perfect blueberries.

"It's a bit of a hidden treasure [as] it's usually around other items that are more popular," Higgins said. "So usually, Rodrigues Blueberry Wine is low-lying to the ground in the stores, just like it's low-lying in the crates in the hillside of Markland.

"So you have to go out and harvest this wine from the massive jungle that is the LCBO."

Rodrigues Blueberry Wine sells at the LCBO for $16.35, which is more than a number of grape wines, including Manischewitz, but is very reasonable for blueberries.

"I challenge people to go and look at the cost of pure blueberry juice at the store," said Higgins, who suggests the wine be kept at cellar temperature or put briefly in the fridge. "It's not much less than $16.

"The Rodrigues Blueberry Wine is the only straight 100 per cent blueberry in the LCBO," Higgins added. "There are a couple of places in Ontario that make blueberry wine and sell straight from their winery, and theirs are all priced anywhere from $17 to $25."

At an alcoholic content of 10 per cent, it is a versatile wine.

"You can freeze fruit juice into ice cubes and put them into it and top it up with club soda or champagne," Higgins said. "In that way, we turn it into a cooler, but [not one with] synthetic flavour.

"If you take sparkling fruit juice and add it to the wine, it has all natural flavours, which is preferable."

Rodrigues WINERY

Higgins recommends drinking Rodrigues Blueberry Wine within three to four days of opening it, and says that it gets richer in flavour and develops some deeper notes to it.

"If you don't finish it, there are lots of things you can do with it afterwards, like turning it into a blueberry vinaigrette or reducing it to create a blueberry sauce, which is great over cheesecake," Higgins said.

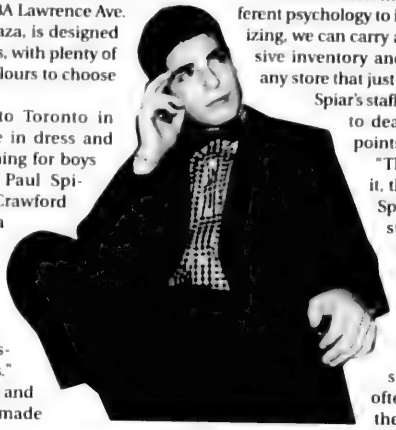
Crawford Boys is a good fit

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Suit shopping, especially for kids, can feel like a chore.

But at Crawford Boys Clothing (416-782-8137 or crawfordboys@gmail.com), they might actually have a good time.

The fixture at 508A Lawrence Ave. W. in Lawrence Plaza, is designed exclusively for boys, with plenty of sizes, styles and colours to choose from.



"We're unique to Toronto in that we specialize in dress and better casual clothing for boys aged 4-16," said Paul Spiar, the owner of Crawford Boys. "We carry a full range of not just regular-sized clothing, [but] husky sizes as well, which is a very important aspect of the business."

The focus on kids and young adults has made Crawford Boys better suited to take care of them.

"It allows us to be more expert in what the young boys need and how to fit them properly, and we can become quite expert in dealing with the young boys, which is often quite different than their fathers," Spiar said.

"It's a whole different approach, a different psychology to it, and by specializing, we can carry a far more extensive inventory and selection than any store that just carries a bit of it.

Spiar's staff is well equipped to deal with the finer points of the business.

"They're expert in it, they're fantastic," Spiar said. "They're strong believers in providing the best in customer service, and customers trust us."

Going in to shop with a kid often means all of the children have to tag along.

But Crawford Boys isn't exactly a stuffy place for them to have to be.

"We have some distractions for them," Spiar said.

"We've got some toys for them to play with, a car for the young ones to drive around in, we have some blocks that they can play with, and a basketball net where they can shoot hoops.

"I've got a huge box full of hockey and baseball cards that kids can poke through, and we always tell them to grab a handful for themselves before they leave.

"Overall, we enjoy working with the younger kids and we just have a good time joking around with them," Spiar said.

It's been memorable enough for those kids that when they have children of their own, they bring them to Crawford Boys too, he said.

"Over the past five or six years, we've been seeing second generations coming in," Spiar said.

"We've seen mothers who are now grandmothers, reintroducing themselves, and we have boys coming in and telling me that, although I may not remember them, they bought a bar mitzvah suit here and they have a little boy now.

Paul Spiar

"We've started carrying some young men's suits, because kids are bigger and taller now. We're carrying a nice selection of young men's slim-fit suits for the older boys. So we're moving a bit in that direction."

If they're not doing something you'd like to see, just go ahead and tell them, Spier said.

"We're always telling our customers to let us know if there's something they think we should be carrying [or] if there's something we can improve on with the store too, because we're always looking to be better than we are." ■

Bar/bat mitzvah students help repair the world

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

During times of celebration, families and friends often focus on the parties, lavish gifts and fancy dinners.

But Ve'ahavta, a Canadian humanitarian and relief organization dedicated to helping the needy and promoting the Jewish value of tzedakah, recently launched an iMitzvah program to give celebrations more meaning.

Although they've had a tikkun olam program for years, in which students looking to make their bar/bat mitzvah more meaningful could make a monetary donation or participate in one of their programs, iMitzvah is a new program that will allow children entering their bar/bat mitzvah years the opportunity to engage in good deeds in a variety of ways.

"I like to call it a holistic approach to the bar mitzvah project," said Robyn Segall, Ve'ahavta's director of communications and operations. "It's not only a tzedakah component but also a hands-on volunteer program. There aren't a lot of opportunities like this."

The program launched in January 2014 and more than 15 families have already participated.

Left: Josh Arbess donated to the Kinder Kit project and travelled to Haiti with Ve'ahavta to deliver the school supplies to the House of Hope orphanage. Right: Centrepiece program got creative with sock centrepieces.

"It's very rare to find a hands-on meaningful volunteer experience for 12 or 13 year olds. They can go out on a van from 6 p.m. to midnight, distributing clothes, food and hygiene supplies to the homeless.

"Most importantly, they speak to people, providing a friendly face and some company," said Segall.

"They go out and have a powerful experience, and they might direct their tzedakah funds to an experience they've had first hand. Then they come into the office and learn their Torah portion with Avrum [Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta's president and CEO,] relating the very experience they've had through us.

"So now they have a very rich content to deliver their parshah at their bar/bat mitzvah."

Another way to make their affair meaningful is to rent Ve'ahavta's centrepieces, which are baskets filled with items that the homeless need, wrapped in a professional and elegant way. The centrepieces are displayed on the tables at the party, and then the bar/bat mitzvah or other Ve'ahavta volunteers distribute the packages to the homeless.

The idea for the iMitzvah program came to Segall years ago, she said, when she realized that there weren't many meaningful opportunities for young kids to give back in ways that made a difference to them, and touched them.

"I think that raising money and giving is a wonderful thing in and of itself, but if it's not personal I think it loses a lot of impact. When you package it with a first-hand experience and learning, I find it holistic," she said.

"I like to use that word because it incorporates your mind and your intellect. The volunteer experience incorporates the soulfulness, and the giving is part of everything we do in Judaism, especially at the time of the bar/bat mitzvah when you're teaching the student that they have a responsibility to play a role in tikkun olam. If we want them to take that seriously, we have to come at it in a multi-faceted way. When they're truly engaged and truly inspired, that will carry them beyond the party and beyond the bar mitzvah." ■

Ketubah.com clicks with customers

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When you're getting married and it's time to think about a ketubah, the first place many couples look is online.

It's convenient then, that ketubah.com is right there at your fingertips.

The popular, Toronto-based website has been serving customers across the world with brilliant prints for almost two decades.

"We're celebrating our 18th anniversary online," said Michael Shapiro, founder of ketubah.com. "We've been at this longer than anyone, and from the beginning we made the decision to be very specialized and focus entirely on ketubahs."

Shapiro, who had originally been looking to open a fine-art Judaica gallery in Toronto, ended up realizing the market that was there for ketubot.

"As I was doing research on that, it morphed into something different," Shapiro said. "I flipped the idea on its head, and started a business that focused on one type of Judaica that [would be offered] to the entire world."

The website is very extensive and provides options at every price point.

"We want to make ketubahs available to all kinds of couples, in a range of budgets," Shapiro said. "We have some starting at $100, going up to around $900, but most are in the $200 to $300 range."

The quality in all of the ketubot is evident.

"These are fine art, limited edition prints and most of them are based on gorgeous, painstakingly prepared originals," Shapiro said. "The artists make the originals by hand and we work very closely with them and develop the [copies] as master prints.

"These are museum-quality prints that will last a lifetime and beyond."

Their precise and beautiful work has been noticed around the world and has even landed them the opportunity to bring some old ketubot into the 21st century.

"A year and a half ago, we were approached by the Jewish Museum in New York and they asked us if it would be possible for us to make reproductions of some of the most stunning prints they had in their collection, going back to the 1500's," Shapiro said. "We'd never done anything like that, but it seemed like a fabulous challenge and opportunity."

If you go to their website and look under 'museum ketubahs', you can find prints of ketubot from almost 600 years ago, which can be reproduced and are for sale.

"We started last year with eight of European origin, from Germany and Italy, and now we have ones from Rhodes, Iran and Morocco," Shapiro said. "Each of those represents the artistic preferences and methods that were used in those areas across time."

Shapiro, who was eager to reproduce these, quickly discovered that the old ketubot were a hit with the current generation.

"I knew this would be a really worthwhile thing to work on, but I was surprised at how popular these designs are with [contemporary] couples," Shapiro said. "They've really struck a chord.

"You can get a museum-quality, stunning ketubah from centuries ago, but with your ketubah text."

"We have different text choices for all denominations," he said.

Getting a beautiful design for your ketubah is also part of the enhancement of the mitzvah.

"It taps into a very old tradition of hiddur mitzvah, which is to make a Jewish ritual object beautiful," Shapiro said. "While it's not a halachic requirement, there's a lot of tradition to make a ketubah something that is beautiful, and these days, an expression of the couple's shared artistic taste."

The comprehensive website is well-designed and user friendly.

"In the last 18 years, being so focused on one thing, we've evolved our service and website to make it as easy as possible for customers," Shapiro said.

You can find them online at www.ketubah.com. ■

Hospital launches Boomerang Project

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation has recently launched its Boomerang Project, which will provide boys and girls who are becoming bar/bat mitzvahs with the opportunity to support a hospital in Israel and learn important life lessons.

Lisa Colt, executive director of Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital, said, "The Boomerang Project is a wonderful way to learn about charity while making a meaningful impact in support of the Wilf Children's Hospital at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem."

Nicole Rudberg, who will be celebrating her 12th birthday on July 3, is participating in the project.

With a passion for basketball, Nicole put together a fundraising challenge, Hoop Jam, that will take place Sept.14, at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Viewmount campus.

Kids ages 8 to 14 can register with an entrance fee of $20. Participants will receive a t-shirt, enjoy refreshments, kosher pizza, entertainment by the Magen Boys, and prizes.

"Everyone is welcome to come out, have fun and shoot some basketball. We are encouraging the kids to have a goal of raising $100," said Barb Rudberg, Nicole's mother.

Funds raised from Hoop Jam will go to the Huberfeld Neonatal Intensive Care Unit, Israel's largest and most advanced facility for the treatment of premature and sick babies.

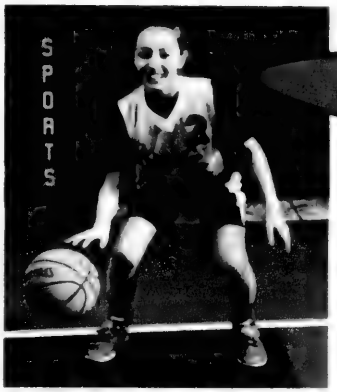
Nicole and her family will be travelling to Israel in 2015 where she will have her bat mitzvah service and visit Shaare Zedek Hospital.

The Boomerang Project offers a variety of ways a child can make a difference in the lives of pediatric patients at the hospital.

Wheelchairs are in high demand at the Wilf Children's Hospital, and they are affordable to purchase. One way to help purchase a wheelchair is by setting up a personal fundraising page on the Boomerang website, and raising funds. For every $500 raised, a wheelchair is purchased for the hospital.

Boomerang participants will be invited to play in a special exhibition basketball game with an NBA alumnus, win prizes, and receive a plaque on the Wheelchair Wall at Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

Through their imagination and a desire to make a difference, participants in the project can choose the area of support at the hospital that resonates with them.



Nicole Rudberg

If fundraising isn't their thing, they can still support Shaare Zedek by donating a portion of their bar/bat mitzvah gifts. There are wonderful and unique programs in need of support, such as the pediatric art therapy program, clown therapy, and pet therapy in the Wilf Children's Hospital.

Shaare Zedek is the city's fastest growing hospital and the only major medical facility in the city's centre, treating more than 500,000 patients annually. An academic health science centre fully affiliated with Hebrew University School of Medicine, Shaare Zedek is deeply committed to treating patients of every race, religion, nationality and political view with compassion for all human life.

The hospital does not receive government funding for equipment, education and research and relies on donors around the world to provide philanthropy.

The hospital's existing pediatric facilities were built nearly 30 yeas ago, and since 1979, the number of children treated as in-patients has risen by 400 per cent. As a result, the hospital has taken on one of Israel's most significant and ambitious projects, with the construction of a $60-million Next Generation Building. This new centre of excellence will focus on providing maternal, infant and pediatric care together in one facility and will be complete by the end of 2014.

Windsor Arms has an old world charm

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The old world charm coupled with modern amenities makes the Windsor Arms Hotel (416-971-9666, windsorarmshotel.com) a popular venue to host your next celebration.

The building dates back to the 1920s, but was completely rebuilt to create a modern space infused with the history of the Toronto community.

In addition to its convenient location – near Bloor street – the Windsor Arms features different rooms depending on the event you're hosting. Its legendary tea room is perfect for private dinners, anniversary parties or small gatherings, while its lounge bar is great for an event that is less formal than a big party, and its courtyard café is perfect for a formal affair, holding up to 500 people standing or 250 seated.

"The room is extremely flexible with great acoustics," said George Friedmann, president of the hotel.

"You can literally walk in. If you want to transform it you can, but you can simply come in and spend nothing on the décor."

If you do book an event at the hotel, be prepared to see celebrities or political figures walking through the lobby. The hotel has featured the likes of Elton John, who hosted his engagement party there, and performances by Andrea Bocelli.

While many other venues restrict you to use their own preferred vendors, the Windsor Arms has no such policy. "Our clients are open to bring in their own florists or vendors, anything other than food and beverages," said Friedmann.

Their world-class kitchen will custom create the menu you're looking for, which can be anything from a Russian-themed menu to a traditional Jewish meal.

The venue has both kosher and non-kosher kitchens. If you don't wish to contract many suppliers, everything can be done in-house – they have their own dishes, cutlery, tables, chairs and staff to help event organizers create the ambience they're looking for without running around searching for the perfect vendor.

By hosting your event in a hotel, you also save yourself the hassle of finding hotel rooms for out-of-town guests, as everything can take place in the same venue.

The venue also has valet parking on site, with no need to contract someone else or guarantee a certain number of cars.

But one of the biggest benefits to hosting your event at the Windsor Arms is that once the night is over and the guests have gone home, you can recreate the memories you shared with your loved ones. The hotel offers kosher, à la carte dining on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, made in their in-house kosher kitchen (as well as non-kosher dining).

"You can return to the Windsor Arms and relive that experience, whereas you're not able to do that if the event is at a rental banquet hall," said Friedmann. ■

Cupido a leader in moderate priced jewelry

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Sometimes, best friends can make the best business partners.

That's what Jeff Karadkjian and Haigo Derian discovered when the lifelong friends opened the jewelry store, Cupido (cupidodesigns.com) in 2007 at Vaughan Mills shopping centre in Concord.

Derian's family-owned business, L'Oro Jewellery, had given him a strong background in the industry and with their solid partnership, the two friends' goal was a store that provided affordable luxury for both men and women.

Fast forward seven years and Cupido has distinguished itself as a leader in the moderate-to-mid-priced jewelry and watch industry, with new locations in Bayview Village and a third soon to open at Kitchener's Fairview Park this summer.

"It's our job to find you a piece of jewellery that you will fall in love with," says Christina Patriarca, Cupido's public relations manager. "Every year, Jeff and Haigo travel to numerous watch and jewelry conventions where they select brands that reflect a certain degree of quality, aesthetic appeal, comfort and practicality. This allows us to expose our customers to various trends."

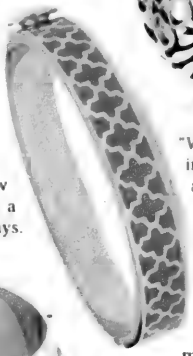
Jeff and Haigo are fabulous when it comes to spotting product trends and bringing flare and uniqueness to their store shelves, she adds. "The brands we carry have culture, and expose consumers to new design concepts."

Browse in one of Cupido's stores and you'll see products by a wide range of designers. There's Pandora, best known for its charm bracelets, and Canadian designer Hera, whose designs are inspired by nature and the ocean. Judith Ripka's gemstones, rich textures and fine craftsmanship are on display as are watches by Oris, the Swiss manufacturer with a distinct red rotor.

Watches by scientist Philip Stein use natural frequency technology which channels frequencies that are beneficial to mind and body, while the watches of Frederique Constant have become desirable collectors' pieces. Two designers new to Cupido are Oscar de la Renta and Halcyon Days, the latter known for its bangles.

As a result of the sheer diversity of designs, Cupido has become known for its striking array of jewelry and watches. "We like to think of ourselves as a boutique-like shop, where you can find the most interesting pieces," Patriarca says. "Our products are constantly on trend, new, exciting, and pieces that will last."

Some shoppers are looking to treat themselves to something new and exciting while others are shopping for gifts. They choose Cupido because they know they'll find a quality product at a comfortable price, Patriarca says.



"We understand budgets are important, so we try to give as many options as possible to fit clients' needs. But shopping for a gift in our stores makes it difficult to resist picking up a little something for yourself, too."

The Kitchener location marks the continuation of exciting growth for the company, and will bring new brands to Cupido, she says. "We're looking forward to getting to know customers in this location and offering them a 'shop-in-shop' branded experience." ■

AGO – an exquisite venue for every type of party

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of Toronto's most unique party venues is the Art Gallery of Ontario (416-979-6634, www.ago.net/venue-rental, email events@ago.net) located in a stunning building designed by Frank Gehry, and filled with an incredible collection of art.

The 20,000-square-foot gallery has hosted a wide range of events including galas, weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, fundraisers, birthdays and celebrations of life.

There are several choices for party planners within the AGO. Baillie Court, the dedicated event space, boasts Douglas fir walls, floor-to-ceiling windows with incredible views of downtown, and a capacity of 300 guests for sit-down dinner-dance celebrations.

"A typical dinner reception starts at $250 per person and includes the venue rental, tables, chairs, linens, staff, rentals and food and beverages," says Beth Bruno, AGO's sales and events manager.

The historic Walker Court is another potential venue, a space embraced by marble archways, a soaring 40-foot atrium ceiling and glass mezzanine arcades – perfect for a full event of up to 400, or a cocktail reception.

ART GALLERY OF ONTARIO

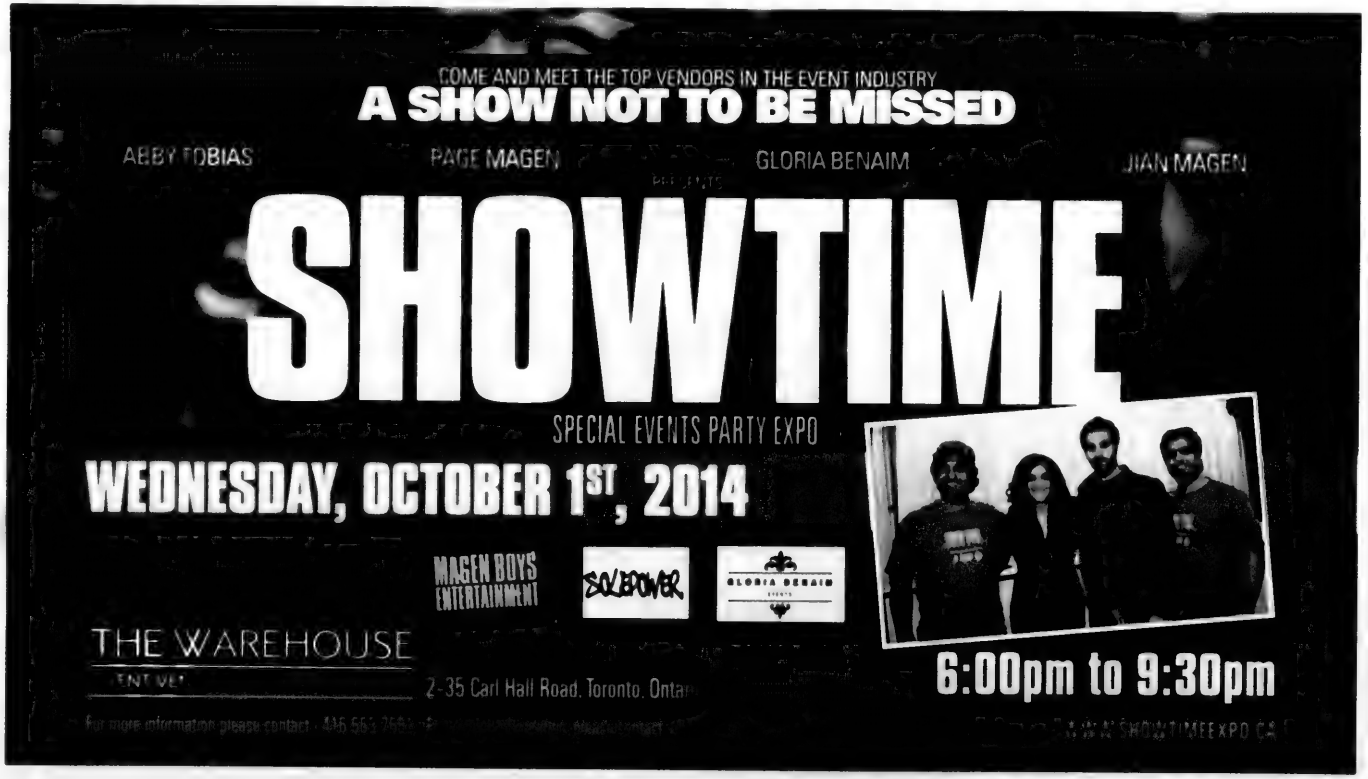
For smaller events, the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Sculpture Atrium comfortably accommodates 40 and overlooks the Grange, a historic, ivy-covered mansion. Galleria Italia, overlooking Dundas Street, is a grand place to view sunsets through the 40-foot wood and glass ceiling wall.

The AGO has a full event planning department staffed by resourceful specialists. "There's a designated co-ordinator to ensure seamless execution of every event," Bruno says. "The co-ordinator provides connections to preferred suppliers and offers a wealth of creative ideas that add value."

The culinary team at the AGO is nothing short of incredible, she says. "We offer completely customized menus based on the personal taste of the host, with a focus on local, organic and in-season produce, and we produce pretty much everything within the walls of the gallery," Bruno adds. The AGO also works with two kosher caterers: the Park Hyatt and PR Creative.

Feedback from guests at the events hosted at the AGO has been amazing, says Bruno, but the best compliment is from those who ask if the gallery will do off-site catering. "There's a lot of competition in off-site catering in the city of Toronto and we've not really gone in this direction yet," she says. "But when you hear people asking this, you know it's not just the location they're after, but that the food, service and planning was top notch."

The spaces at the AGO can be customized for events as private as 10 guests up to 2,000, with themes often inspired by art. "Some of our clients really go [all out] with their theme and others let the beauty of the gallery shine through and keep things simple and sophisticated," Bruno says. ■



Bat mitzvah girl donates hair

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Teaching children to give back to the community is a goal for many parents.

One way for the kids to do this is through an act of tzedakah, a major tenet of Judaism, by offering a gift or otherwise helping another person.

Maddy Thaller

Maddy Thaller chose to grow her hair and donate it to be used for a wig for a cancer patient. It took her a long time to grow her hair to a length of 10 inches, which was her goal, but she was determined.

"The cut" took place before her bat mitzvah ceremony on May 24 at the Danforth Jewish Circle.

"I know people inside and outside of my family who have been affected by cancer or who have had cancer. I have always wanted to cut my hair for cancer, and I thought this would be a good time because of the tikkun olam factor of my bat mitzvah," said Maddy.

Maddy used social media to create a page at cancer.ca for family and friends to donate to her cause.

When this article was written – before her bat mitzvah – she had raised $1,050 and the donations were still rolling in, she said with pride.

Proctor & Gamble Canada, in partnership with the Canadian Cancer Society, launched the Pantene Beautiful Lengths campaign in 2007. The partnership encourages Canadians to donate their hair to create real-hair wigs for people who are undergoing cancer treatment.

"You can choose where you want the funds to go and we chose 'wherever it was needed most' at the Canadian Cancer Society," Maddy said.

Pantene has received over 40,000 ponytails for real-hair wigs that the Canadian Cancer Society distributes across the country.

The program accepts donations of hair, then creates, ships and donates the wigs to Canadian Cancer Society wig banks across Canada. There is no cost to the society or to the individuals who receive the wigs.

"In donating my hair, I will be helping someone build more confidence and be more comfortable. It's not a hard thing to do to cut your hair for cancer," Maddy said.

A talented musician, Maddy is carrying on her family's passion for the arts.

"Both of my parents are musicians. My mom [Joanna Reynolds] is a jazz musician and a band teacher. My dad [Rob Thaller] is a pianist and plays with the National Ballet School, and my younger sister is also a musician and dancer."

She began playing piano at the age of four, and switched to violin when she was seven. The following year, she started bass guitar in school and then began private bass lessons last year.

"I love to sing, dance and act, and I performed at my bat mitzvah party, sitting in with the band."

Her parents are teaching her to perform good deeds by setting the example. Leading up to Maddy's big day, she and her father volunteered at the Good Shepherd Shelter. "We helped in the kitchen, preparing food." ■

Kosher caterer cooked

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Mitchell Lipperman may not be a celebrity chef, but he has cooked for many celebrities.

He was the executive chef at various hot spots where Matthew McConaughey, Sally Field, Courteney Cox, Tim Allen and other Hollywood stars have dined when they visited Toronto.

Cox and Allen were regulars when they were filming in Toronto, Lipperman recalls. "They could go anywhere. The fact that they came back to my dining room multiple times was tremendously gratifying."

He has even part of the team that cooked for Queen Elizabeth II when she stayed at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel in 1997.

Lipperman, 42, the executive chef of Exquisite Gourmet (416-356-5987), may have few encounters with celebrities now that he is shomer Shabbat, but he brings all his skills as a classically trained chef to the kosher (COR) catering company he has founded (www. exquisitegourmet.com) following the encouragement of his wife, Kelly.

He says his apprenticeship at the Royal York with master chef George McNeill, was "superb training." In fact, thanks to that training, Lipperman was a gold medalist in the World Junior Culinary Olympics.

He insists that the quality of his cooking has remained as high as ever. "Proper classical cooking can be done within kashruth. My raison d'etre is to show people that kosher cuisine can be as good and creative as non-kosher cuisine."

The key to fine cuisine is to use high quality ingredients and prepare them in a simple way, or as he puts it, "do the least amount to it."

Italian cuisine epitomizes this type of cooking, because the number of ingredients is minimal, he explains. "It's all about the quality of the products and the cooking technique."

These days, Lipperman works out of the kosher kitchen at La Gondola, a banquet hall at Highway 7 and Bowes Road in Concord. "It offers great value for bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings."

He can also cater parties and simchahs in private homes and banquet halls like the Warehouse, a generic venue without ties to a specific kosher caterer.

He does many barbeques and special dinners and he runs cooking classes, as well.

Lipperman does not work with set menus. "Ninety-five per cent of the food I prepare is customized."

He suggests that people consider increasing their budgets slightly to get the best food possible.

"For an extra $2 or $3 you can get a better cut of meat, and get it fresh instead of frozen. People will pay for value and quality."

He is also a meat specialist. "I studied meat. If I'm going to prepare steak, I use sea salt to enhance the flavour, along with olive oil and fresh-ground pepper. I let the product shine and showcase it. It's not about being fancy."

And it's also not necessary to spend a lot of money, according to Lipperman. "My classic roast chicken is very much in demand."

So are his salad dressings, which can be ordered by the litre, he adds.

He is also trying to educate the public on for royalty

eating wild-caught fish. "I'm on a serious mission to teach people to choose fish other than salmon and tilapia. There's lots of good wild fish out there."

He likes Pacific halibut and Atlantic cod, but he also works with red snapper, sea bream and specialty fish like boca negra. His training enables him to fillet the fish, which is required for kashrut.

After his apprenticeship at the Royal York, Lipperman trained under Brad Long (now his mentor) at the Air Canada Centre, before working as executive chef for a number of trendy restaurants.

Some readers may be familiar with Lipperman's kosher cooking during his 1 1/2 year stint as executive chef of 398 West, the now defunct gourmet kosher restaurant on Eglinton Avenue. "It was a tremendous experience, but the business could not sustain its overhead."

For a bar mitzvah held on Lag b' Omer, Lipperman, who is a trained pastry chef, created a bonfire cake for the holiday theme. There were air-brushed burning logs and an edible flame of poured sugar.

For a Shabbat kallah, Lipperman designed a three-tier, multi-themed chocolate pound cake with Belgian chocolate mousse and strawberry cream made with fresh berries. One tier was the night sky with shimmering stars and a dolphin; the second tier was an ombre – one colour fading into the next – to represent sunrise and the dawn of a new marriage; and the top tier with its two tablets, symbolized the bride and groom becoming an integral part of each other.

Whether he's preparing desserts or full meals, Lipperman says he abides by one main philosophy:

"Good cooking is not about fancy or expensive. Rather it's about quality and integrity." ■

When it comes to pairing Rodrigues Blueberry Wine, once again, there are many options in doing so.

"You can have it as an aperitif, you can have it as a dessert wine, but if you plan on serving it with an entrée, there are some soft cheeses with cranberries or blueberries in them," Higgins said. "The bit of sweetness in the wine pairs nicely with the bit of sweetness in the food.

"[Other] entrees that work well would be turkey with cranberry sauce, foods with applesauce, sweet-and-sour items like chicken, or things that have soy in them."

But Higgins' personal favourite food with the wine is cheesecake.

"It's amazing with it," Higgins said. "If you drink a glass of this blueberry wine with even a plain piece of cheesecake, it tastes as though the cheesecake is smothered in fresh, wild blueberries."

Rodrigues Blueberry Wine is available at the LCBO and can be found online by searching product number 337824. ■

The Pickle Barrel focuses on its customers' needs

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Just days before the reopening of the Pickle Barrel restaurant at the Centerpoint Mall, Peter Higley, president and CEO of Pickle Barrel Foods (www.Picklebarrel.ca), is on site at this Yonge and Steeles location taking care of the last details.

Despite his hectic schedule, he's eager to talk about the renovations, because in the last 1 1/2 years, the restaurant chain has renovated all of its restaurants. "We're changing the design to keep up with the trends, he says.

Some examples of the updating include the new 80-seat patio at the original location (5941 Leslie St.) and the additional 3,000 square feet that has been added to the restaurant at Yorkdale, which now also has a private room for 60 to 70 people.

This private space is ideal for brunches, birthdays and dinners for out-of-town guests, he says. "It's great for an informal gathering."

The main dining rooms in most of The Pickle Barrel restaurants can often accommodate parties of 15 to 20, he adds.

The food at The Pickle Barrel has also been updated, says Higley. "We re-engineered the menu and transformed the restaurant from a deli. We keep modernizing. We don't keep still.

"Jewish people are health conscious, so the menus are always changing. We serve quinoa bowls packed with vegetables and fish or chicken. They're very popular. So are our innovative salads with mixed greens and cheese. We still have our old favourites, but we're also focused on healthy eating."

Food and lifestyle maven, Rose Reisman, has helped design the Art of Living menu. Her recipes appeal to diners looking for healthy menu options, according to Higley.

He also says the menus from the different restaurants vary. For instance, the restaurants at Centerpoint and Promenade malls offer soup in a pot with kreplach and chicken because that is a favourite of many of the Jewish clientele who frequent these eateries.

"We really look at our location," says Higley. "We let the customers tell us what's going to work for us. We keep tweaking the menu."

Despite the money spent on renovations, The Pickle Barrel aims to keep the menu prices from rising. "Value is close to our heart all the time. We're always looking to charge less."

He points to the well-priced all-inclusive party packages (416-984-5348) at the Pickle Barrel's Rose Room (5941 Leslie St.) and the banquet hall located at the shopping centre at Highway 7 and McCowan Road.

The Rose Room can accommodate 75 guests, and the banquet hall holds 210 guests for sit-down dinner and dance events.

Higley says these venues are ideal for bar and bat mitzvahs, and the brunch package is well suited to showers, special birthdays, baby namings, anniversaries and other events.

The Pickle Barrel offers one-stop shopping for bar and bat mitzvahs. Packages include the DJ, invitations, linen choices, menu selections, celebration cakes, centrepieces and giveaways.

The company also has a large catering arm, he says. People can choose from a comprehensive menu and they can get all their party rentals, as well.

In its more than 40 years of operation, The Pickle Barrel restaurant's philosophy has remained unchanged, says Higley. "We offer a comfortable, fun atmosphere with quick, efficient and friendly service, fantastic food and unbelievable value.

"We really focus on our customers. That's what we've done for the last 43 years." ■

Wax Hands Fun Zone offers a creative and unique touch to any party, especially children's parties, bar and bat mitzvahs and sweet sixteens.

A fixture at Canada's Wonderland for three years, Wax Hands now travels to private parties to create hand impressions made out wax.

"The whole process itself is very fascinating, because it really is kind of magical," says Ilona Petrenko, owner of Wax Hands.

Petrenko and her team brings a special machine to parties and can individualize each hand according to the client's specifications.

"We can personalize the hand so they can do a sign that means something to them, like 'I love you' in sign language," she says.

They can also use different colour combinations and motifs. For example, for Canada Day, they designed a hand that was red and white with a leaf in the middle.

For the romantics among us, couples can clasp their hands together and use it to decorate their house.

They also make good presents for Mother's and Father's Day. "What parent wouldn't adore an impression of their little one's hand?" she asks.

"At the end of the day," she says, "For the guest who books us for the party it's a great thing to take home to remember that event." ■

Avenue Banquet Hall offers one-stop service

The Boulevard Room

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When clients come to the Avenue Banquet Hall (905-669-0777, theavenuebanquethall.com) to host their event, they get more than just an elegant, spacious venue.

Before owning the hall, Marla Kay was a wedding and party planner for 30 years, and she utilizes her expertise to help clients organize their events.

"I have knowledge on how to put together your function. It always puts the client at ease because they're speaking to someone who has experience. They're able to ask me questions about itineraries, how the day will go, and what they need beside venue and catering," said Kay.

Kay is also proud to offer her clients at the Avenue Banquet Hall a unique experience: an exclusive single event venue that can hold up to 400 people, and is the one-stop-shop you need to make your night one to remember.

The elegant hall features high ceilings, crystal chandeliers and marble flooring and can service kosher and non-kosher functions.

If planning a wedding, the banquet hall has a separate room for the ceremony so there is no need to wait for the staff to flip your room. As a single event venue, your party won't be colliding with others on your special day, ensuring that the staff is focused on your affair.

"The Avenue staff only services one function per day so everything is concentrated on you rather than spread out to four or five parties," she said.

The venue is also well known for its superb food – the chefs can create unique menus for your party, from East or West Indian to Russian to Italian or Portuguese.

"One of my chefs is from Barbados so you're eating authentic West Indian food. We've been doing it kosher and the reaction has been amazing because everyone is tired of chicken and beef. It's nice to offer them something different for a change," said Kay.

This also comes in handy for couples merging two different cultures.

"I had a multicultural couple – Russian and Canadian – so we tailored the menu to please both cultures and it worked out so beautifully."

After hosting so many functions at the Avenue Banquet Hall, Kay realized there was a hole in the market place – many clients she met wanted to host formal parties but with about 100 guests, something most banquet halls won't accommodate.

To meet this demand, she opened the Boulevard Room, also a single event venue located next door, which can fit 120 guests.

"At the Avenue, we were bombarded with people trying to book smaller parties and we couldn't accommodate them because the room is too big. Now having the Boulevard has opened up the floodgates," she said.

"We're booking by word of mouth because it's hard to find a smaller venue. Everyone loves that they're eating the Avenue food."

Both venues are serviced by Mitzuyan Kosher Catering, which has kosher kitchens on site.

The room has beautiful flooring with drop-down chandeliers and high, open ceilings, but is more laid back and funky than the elegant Avenue hall.

"Some of my brides are now doing bar and bat mitzvahs for their children. Now, some of my bar and bat mitzvah children are getting married and are so excited to come and get married here," said Kay.

"It's such a nice feeling and that's the service we generate. It's a nice warm feeling and good for the community." ■

Brunch for 40 can be easy as pie

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

My precious and adorable grandson Lincoln turned one in January. My son, Ariel, and daughter-in-law, Angeleka, planned to throw him a birthday lunch.

My son called to tell me, and the second thing he said to me was, "you are going to cook aren't you?"

Of course, I said. What else am I here for?

For the venue we decided to use my friend Sheila's spacious and beautifully appointed condominium party room. Angeleka and I had a planning meeting and decided to serve a buffet dairy lunch followed by a sweet table. There would be about 40 people and some children.

We started to draw up lists. Angeleka was in charge of choosing all the paper goods, plates, napkins, disposable cups for cold and hot drinks as well as plastic flatware. She decided on a rainbow theme and made the appropriate choices.

Ariel and Angeleka ordered the bagels, four dozen assorted, as well as two double breads, one rye with seeds and the other pumpernickel. They bought three very large frozen packages of lox, two large tubs of cream cheese and prepared a plentiful platter of cheese and crackers. They also bought and cut up the tomatoes, onions and cucumbers to go with the lox.

My task was to prepare the egg salad and the tuna salad. I also prepared a very large crudités platter (veggies to dip) with several bowls of dip.

Both Angeleka and I baked an assortment of desserts, cakes, cookies, cupcakes and squares. Ariel and Angeleka also prepared several large fruit platters for the sweet table and also ordered an adorable rainbow birthday cake which was the centrepiece of the sweet table.

Ariel and Angeleka arrived early and decorated the room with rainbow streamers and balloons. Loads of nostalgic candy all in rainbow colours, as well as rainbow party whistles and carnival masks decorated the buffet and tables around the room. One section of the room was dedicated as a play area for the children. A blanket, printed with a city design complete with roads for cars to run over, was put down on the floor with an assortment of toys. The children were 'good to go'; my grandson's favourite thing to say. On the opposite side of the room we set up assorted drinks. I brought a 30-cup percolator for coffee, a kettle and a thermos carafe for tea. Cases of water and assorted cases of pop ensured that no guest would go thirsty. The most challenging part of the party was the schlepping of all the serving pieces, platters, bowls and food from our homes to the party room. But once everything was in place it was magic. The perfect party for our amazing one-year-old boy.

Egg Salad For 40

- ❑ 4 dozen large eggs
- ❑ 1 1/3 cups Miracle Whip Light
- ❑ 1 cup sweet pickle relish
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. pepper

Divide eggs between two large pots. Cover eggs with cold water and place on stove over high heat. Bring the water to a rolling boil then place lids on the pots and turn off the heat.

Set timer to 20 minutes and let the eggs remain in the hot water. When the time is up, carefully drain the water off the eggs using the lid to hold in the eggs. Cover the eggs with cold water and drain again. Cover the pot again, holding the lid on with your hands and shake the pot several times so the eggs will hit the lid. This will crack the eggs and make them easy to peel.

Cover with more cold water. Carefully peel the eggs, checking to make sure there is no remaining shell, and place them in a large bowl. When all the eggs are shelled, drain off any excess water from the bowl of eggs and begin to mash them with a potato masher. Mash until there are no longer any large chunks of egg. Add in the remaining ingredients and combine well. Line a large bowl with plastic wrap and fill with the egg salad. This will create a decorative mould for the brunch. Cover and refrigerate until cold before serving. To serve place a platter over the bowl and turn bowl over onto the platter. Remove plastic wrap. ■

Tuna Salad For 40

- ❑ 10 cans of white tuna in water
- ❑ 2/3 cup of Miracle Whip Light
- ❑ 1 jar sliced green olives

Drain off water from each tin of tuna. Place tuna in a large bowl. Combine in the remaining ingredients. Line a medium-sized bowl with plastic wrap and fill with the tuna salad. This will create a decorative mould for the brunch. Cover and refrigerate until cold before serving. To serve place a platter over the bowl and turn bowl over onto the platter. Remove plastic wrap.

Cumin Dip

- ❑ 1 cup low fat or fat free sour cream
- ❑ 1 cup shredded cheese, cheddar, Tex Mex or assorted cheeses
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. dried cumin
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/8 tsp. pepper
- ❑ zest of one lime
- ❑ 1 tbsp. fresh lime juice

Combine all the ingredients and keep refrigerated until serving. ■

Charming Cherry Chocolate Cake

- ❑ 1 1/2 cups sugar
- ❑ 2/3 cups canola oil
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 2 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ 2 2/3 cups flour
- ❑ 2/3 cup cocoa
- ❑ 2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 2 tsp. baking soda
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 2 cups boiling water
- ❑ 2/3 cup chocolate chips
- ❑ 1 can of cherry pie filling
- ❑ 1/4 cup cherry brandy

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9-in. spring form pan with canola oil and line bottom with parchment paper.

In food processor blend sugar, canola oil, eggs and pure vanilla. Run the processor for about one minute. Add in flour, cocoa, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Pulse once or twice. Run processor adding in one cup of the boiling water.

With a spatula, scrape down sides and bring up mixture from the bottom breaking up any lumps and making sure it is smooth. Run processor again adding in the remaining boiling water. Add in the chocolate chips and pulse once or twice. Pour batter into the spring form pan and place on a baking sheet. Bake for 50 to 60 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into the middle of the cake comes out clean and the cake springs back when touched. Cool.

Remove cake from the pan and split cake horizontally into two sections. Separate the layers. Mix cherry pie filling with cherry brandy. Spoon one half of the cherry mixture over the bottom layer. Replace the top layer and spoon remain cherry mixture over the top of the cake. ■

Magen brothers go back to their roots with Uptown Loft

Jian and Page Magen

DANIELLE KUBES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Magen brothers' newest venture is a full service venue at Yonge and Eglinton, Uptown Loft.

The 3,000-square-foot venue is a blank space – with white walls, hardwood floors and a state-of-the-art lighting system – that's able to convert seamlessly to suit a wide variety of functions, from cocktail parties, to corporate conferences, to weddings.

"From a décor point of view, it's such a blank slate. There are so many different looks and visual effects that you can create in this space. Because when Page [Magen] – a last name familiar to anyone on the bar mitzvah circuit since the late '90s – took it over he did something very smart and made it very flexible. Everything is white so you can create any sort of look you want, " Sarah Feldberg, general manager of Uptown Loft, says.

And just because it's owned by the Magen brothers, Page and Jian, doesn't mean you're limited to using Magen Boys Entertainment services. In fact, Uptown Loft allows clients to use any vendor they choose while still providing the option to do everything in-house.

"We're all about sharing the business to do whatever is best for clients," Page says. "We're totally cool with all of that – we love that, we want that."

That's a rarity in Toronto where, usually, one has to use all the venue's own services, or hire solely outside vendors.

That means Uptown Loft caters to both exhausted working mothers and picky bridezillas.

"We think that sets us apart from other venues. We can do everything start to finish and make it turn-key, or we can take a step back and let clients do their own decision-making and bring in their own vendors as they choose," Feldberg says.

The loft also holds a special place in the Magen brothers' hearts.

"Well it's funny because our first bat mitzvah, our first event that we ever produced, that we ever worked, was at this venue 13 years ago," Page says.

When the opportunity came up for them to take ownership of the venue, they jumped at the chance.

"We felt like this was a really special place," Page says, "that allowed clients to do the ultimate tailored party." ■

Stones give Israel satisfaction, and neighbour congratulates neighbour

Fans get what they need

They may be almost as old as some of the country's famed sites, but after 50 years, the Rolling Stones finally played Israel. The legendary band performed 19 songs over two hours on June 4 for 50,000 fans at Hayarkon Park in Tel Aviv, despite calls by boycott, divestment and sanctions activists to cancel the show. Most notably, Pink Floyd front man Roger Waters had publicly urged the band not to play Israel. The concert's start time was pushed back to allow those observing Shavuot to arrive comfortably after the holiday ended that evening. Prior to the gig, the band visited the Kotel and placed notes in the wall.

Peres offers mazal tov to al-Sisi

Israeli President Shimon Peres congratulated newly elected Egyptian President Abdul Fattah al-Sisi June 6. During Peres' phone conversation with al-Sisi, Peres stressed "Israel's commitment to maintain the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt and strengthening the co-operation between the countries," Peres' office said. He also wished the Egyptian people "prosperity and success." It didn't say what al-Sisi said in reply, except that he "thanked President Peres for his warm words." Al-Sisi was confirmed June 4, after winning a reported 96.1 per cent of this month's runoff vote. He was to be sworn in Sunday.

Germany approves pension payments

Germany's Bundestag has unanimously passed a law approving back payments of so-called ghetto pensions for Jewish survivors. The law, reflecting years of negotiations, was approved by the federal cabinet in April. It requires retroactive payments of a few hundred euros per month going as far back as July 1, 1997. Some 50,000 people are eligible for the pensions, including 13,000 in Israel. Survivors forced to work in Nazi ghettos had to wait until 2002 for any kind of pension at all. Once these were granted, applicants could claim only a maximum of four years in back payments from the time of filing. ■

Letters to the Editor

Times are changing

I read with great interest the article written by Talia Soberano ("The Inclusion Project," The CJN, May 22).

Times have changed with help coming from many sources. A child with a learning disability has a good chance to succeed in life.

I was also told to leave school and became a server or cleaning woman. That was 60 years ago, and I definitely fell through the cracks.

My late husband and children helped me get through many difficult years, with my math, writing and reading skills. Organizations like Literacy Unlimited helped me much later in life. I only wish there were the resources around when I was growing up. Bravo Talia Soberano.

Rudeness and tolerance

The May 29 Rabbi 2 Rabbi column ("Testing the limits of tolerance") leads me to the following conclusions.

Firstly, Jews on the far right are not taught tolerance. (I say this at the risk of some controversy). By definition, their beliefs are at the extreme, radical end of the spectrum and for self-sustainability alone, their pronouncements cannot afford officially to recognize Jews located elsewhere on the spectrum.

Modern Orthodoxy seems to have figured it out. I have seen no evidence of intolerance here. Modern Orthodox Jews I know attend celebrations or funerals and shivahs wherever necessary and work in Conservative shuls and teach in mixed environments, with a kippah the only obvious, visible evidence of their affiliation.

The "New York Times man" was a rude, ignorant and inconsiderate individual who just happened to be observant as well. I cannot imagine any other Orthodox individual who would condone such conduct.

Recognizing Herb Gray

I was saddened to read Michael Taube's apologia for Prime Minister Stephen Harper's poor decision not to grant Herb Gray a state funeral ("Why Herb Gray didn't have a state funeral," The CJN, May 15).

Taube defends the prime minister by denigrating Gray's accomplishments and suggesting that Gray's Jewishness was a factor – which he dismissed – in considering whether to grant him a state funeral.

The Jewish community is rightly proud of Gray's accomplishments, but this is hardly the reason why he should have been granted a state funeral. Taube's suggestion to this effect smacks of tokenism.

Gray served the people of Windsor and of Canada with dedication, desire and with wit for more than four decades. He was a role model and a mentor to many Canadians, attracting many into public life.

He practised politics of a different sort than those of today. If you want to know why he deserved a state funeral, read the tributes by ordinary Canadians to him in the pages of Canada's newspapers. That the Governor General of Canada, the Chief Justice of Canada and four former prime ministers, including Progressive Conservative Joe Clark chose to attend his funeral, and the prime minister and leading figures in the Conservative Party did not, speaks for itself.

Harper had an opportunity to make a generous and statesmanlike decision. Instead, he chose the path of partisanship.

From the campaign trail

I have spent the last 30 years as your MPP and have served in five ministerial portfolios, including Solicitor General. I have worked hard in York Centre to strengthen and improve your community.

Ontario's economy is strong; more than 459,000 net new jobs have been created since June 2009. But we need to continue to invest in people and partnerships, and not slash services and cut jobs. We need to make sure our healthcare and education systems remain among the best in the world. I will advocate for projects such as the new Humber River Digital Hospital, slated to open next year.

I was born in Toronto to Jewish-Polish immigrants and have spent a lifetime building bridges between Ontario and Israel. I am proud to have led many missions to Israel. I was the founding president of the Toronto regional council of B'nai Brith, and initiated the Holocaust Memorial Day ceremony at Queen's Park two decades ago. I bring this wealth of experience in public service, as well as my wisdom, humility and work ethic. If re-elected, I will continue to work hard on behalf of all constituents. ■

Educating the modern rabbi

Do seminaries give graduates the skill set required to thrive in the pulpit? What's the balance between the mastery of text and practical skills?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ARI ISENBERG
SHAAR SHALOM CONGREGATION, HALIFAX

Rabbi Cutler: Recently, as my Facebook news stream has been lighting up with pictures of friends at their ordination ceremonies, I've been thinking a lot about my own rabbinic education, which concluded five years ago. Rabbi Isenberg, though we are a few years apart, we are both graduates of the rabbinical school of the Jewish Theological Seminary. I wonder: what education is needed to be a successful modern rabbi? What is the balance between the mastery of text and practical skills? In what situations have you felt adequately trained? And as a relatively freshly ordained rabbi, have there been moments when you feel that your formal education was lacking? I'm curious to know if in serving our communities we've encountered the same moments of, "Why didn't they cover that in rabbi school?"

Rabbi Isenberg: It's funny: When people learn that rabbinical school is generally four to six years, I tend to encounter two distinct responses. Some people are shocked and surprised by the length of the program, while others wonder how we could fit everything in.
I recall a teaching once given by Rabbi Danny Nevins, who serves as dean of the rabbinical school you and I attended. When speaking about length of our program, he noted that the Levites weren't asked to serve in the military. Rather, they were to work in the Temple. Unlike the other tribes, who enlisted their sons in the military at age 20, the Levites were enlisted for service in the Temple at the age of 30. What was the benefit of waiting another decade before serving? Perhaps they needed a degree of life experience before beginning training. What's more, once the Levites turn 50, they learn an entirely new skill set in Temple maintenance. Maybe the same is true of rabbis. As we progress and evolve in our roles, we continue to refine our skills, learn new ones and identify renewed ways of serving our people.

Rabbi Cutler: As students, we both participated in required internships that entailed oversight by experienced rabbis. Just as prospective doctors have clerkships and residencies, many rabbi schools mandate supervised internships.
I am blessed with serving alongside a fantastic senior rabbi, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who is my first consultation for difficult cases. There are a few very talented "rabbis' rabbis" who serve as mentors to those in the field. Certainly within the area of Jewish law, there have always been rabbis' rabbis. It is reported that among certain Orthodox institutions, the phone number of the great halachist Rabbi Moshe Feinstein was written on the back of every ordination certificate.
While many people think of pulpit rabbis as being specialists, we know that we're generalists. While we have particular knowledge of a body of literature and sets of traditions, those of us who serve in the pulpit must possess a massive array of skills: programming, preaching, organizational leadership, teaching, counselling, legal decision-making, outreach, etc. None of us, whether after four, six, or 15 years of formal training, can master it all. Rabbi Isenberg, as a lone rabbi, where do you turn for guidance? In what areas of practice do you feel you were well trained and in what areas could rabbinical training be improved?

Rabbi Isenberg: I love the prescription in Pirkei Avot: Acquire a rabbi, it says, and obtain a friend. Even as a rabbi, it's wholly beneficial to have your own rabbi (not dissimilar from a therapist having a therapist). There are several rabbis with whom I consult on a regular basis, including some I've known since my childhood in Montreal.
As the role of a rabbi continues to evolve, the curriculum in rabbinical school has adjusted. While some staples of rabbinic training remain (sacred text study, for instance), there are now emphases placed on new aspects of the job. In my case, being a rabbi in Halifax, I find myself assuming responsibilities that larger shuls in larger centres delegate to an executive director and support staff. As such, I rely heavily on the courses I took in non-profit management. Decades ago, who would have thought that rabbi school curriculum would include courses like that?
I'll conclude with this question: many universities have invested in online learning. Would this model be possible in the rabbinic world? ■

My Jewish playlist

As Jewish holiday after-parties go, the one the Rolling Stones threw post-Shavuot has to rank right up there (though Mimouna probably still tops it). Ha'avanim Hamitgalgalot, as Mick Jagger dubbed his band, brought much-needed levity to 50,000 in Tel Aviv, and in a greater sense to all of Israel. And they inspired me to compile a playlist of my favourite songs by Jewish artists:

- Sweet Jane, Lou Reed: In my mind, there are two kinds of Velvet Underground songs: the subversive tracks that require listeners to be in a very specific mood to "get," and Sweet Jane, which is always just right.
- Ophelia, Robbie Robertson: My father has probably bought fewer than 10 albums for himself since I was a kid. But one of them was The Band's Greatest Hits (a double-tape). People say all kinds of things about Robertson as a band mate, but no one denies his musicianship. To understand why, just watch him rock this song in The Last Waltz.
- (You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman, Carole King: Aretha Franklin made it a hit, but I prefer the songwriter's stripped-down, piano-only version. King's voice adds an entirely new layer of vulnerability to Aretha's interpretation.
- Started From the Bottom, Drake: I'm not ashamed to admit I think this is a cool track. I am, however, a little ashamed to note it took me a while to realize I was listening to the edited-for-radio version.
- A Long December, Adam Duritz: One Friday afternoon in 1997, a pre-Shabbat entertainer cancelled his scheduled appearance at Baycrest hospital in Toronto, and a group of students from Or Chaim high school was thrust into emergency duty. This is what we sang.
- Stay (I Missed You), Lisa Loeb: It's the song my daughter falls asleep to every night. Enough said.
- Last Nite, The Strokes: Guitarist Nick Valensi sets the tone with the opening double-C riff (and he's Jewish). The Strokes' debut album saved the world from bubblegum-pop overload in the fall of 2001.
- The Ballad of El Goodo, Alex Chilton: The eponymous protagonist affirms life gets tough sometimes, but ultimately it's what you make of it – and that God will help you out. By the end of the song, you can't help but feel at least a little bit better.
- You Know I'm No Good, Amy Winehouse: The British singer-songwriter was a phenomenal talent and never shy about her personal demons. This song is a case in point: A catchy, neo-soul number with the chorus "I cheated myself, like I knew I would. I told you I was trouble, you know I'm no good."
- I am Trying to Break Your Heart, Jeff Tweedy: Wilco's lead singer and songwriter told The A.V. Club in 2009, "I wish I was Jewish," so I'll allow this one. When Wilco streamed this track and the album it opens online for free in 2001, it signalled a coming change to the way we consume music.

So there you have it, my 10 favourite songs by or featuring Jewish (and "Je-wish-ing") musicians. Obviously, I left out a lot of great talent – Bob Dylan, Joey Ramone, The Beastie Boys, Leonard Cohen, Steven Page, Miami Boys Choir and so many more. Share your list at cjninfo@gmail.com. ■ — YONI

Muriel Rukeyser: Centennial of a Jewish poet

Robert Hirschfield

To be a Jew in the twentieth century
Is to be offered a gift. If you refuse,
Wishing to be invisible, you choose
Death of the spirit, the stone insanity.
(from Letter To The Front)

It bears mentioning on her centennial that those words of Muriel Rukeyser (Dec.15, 1913-Feb. 12, 1980), written in 1944 of all years, were installed in Reform and Reconstructionist prayer books. A radical feminist and leftist, the poet was amazed but also delighted.

The daughter of well-to-do, Yiddish speaking, Reform Jews in New York, Rukeyser at age 20, drove down to Alabama to stand with the Scottsboro Boys, nine black youths unjustly accused of raping two white women. After Scottsboro, it was Gauley Bridge, W.Va., where she wrote about the unsafe labour conditions responsible for the widespread cases of silicosis among the miners. In 1936, she was one of many Jewish radicals to travel to Spain in support of the anti-fascist Republicans fighting Franco in the Spanish Civil War. Years later, as a middle-aged woman, she would get herself arrested protesting the Vietnam War on the Senate steps.

Jan Heller Levi, who served as Rukeyser's last assistant, and who along with her husband, Christoph Keller, is authoring Rukeyser's biography for Knopf, traces the poet's interest in politics back to when she was a four-year-old. "The first newspaper headline she taught herself to read," Heller Levi recalls with a hearty laugh, "was 'Allies Advance Six Miles South of Soissons.'"

Rukeyer's revolutionary zeal was the cause of parental rejection. Her father,

Muriel Rukeyser, 1962. LIDA MOSER, PARIS PRESS

> To a generation steeped in tweeting, Rukeyser must seem an archaic figure the owner of Colonial Sand & Stone, was particularly incensed by his daughter's staunch anti-capitalism.

Her family featured a mythological anomaly that would affect her poetry. Her mother claimed a putative ancestral relationship to the great scholar and martyr Rabbi Akiba.

Ironically, Rukeyser's poetic references to Akiba were almost devotional. ("She was not," emphasizes Keller, "an ideologue.")

In her poem, Trinity Churchyard, she lauded Akiba as freedom fighter and ecstatic.

Mother I walk, going even here in green Galilee
Where our ancestor, Akiba, resisted Rome
Singing forever the Song of Songs
Even in torture knowing.

The poet, whose commanding size was undercut later in life by strokes and diabetes, was typical of a certain kind of 20th century Jewish radical: inordinately sensitive to social inequality and minority harassment, drawn to big ideas, but keeping to the margins of the gatekeepers of those ideas; in Rukeyser's case, the Communist Party. She was too free spirited and doctrine intolerant to ever be a good communist.

To a generation steeped in the disembodied engagement of tweeting, Rukeyser must seem an archaic figure. To the second wave, feminists of the late '60s (the suffragettes being the first wave), especially poets such as Adrienne Rich, Alicia Ostriker and Ann Sexton, to whom she was "Muriel, mother of everyone," Rukeyser was a hero who wrote her feminist poetry before there was a feminist movement. She also lighted one of the literary fires of that movement's with The Poem As Mask. It begins:

When I wrote of the women in their dances and wildness,
it was a mask,
on their mountain, god-hunting, singing, in orgy,
it was a mask...

Two stanzas later, comes her cri de coeur:

No more masks! No more mythologies!

From Rukeyser's first volume, Theory of Flight (1935) to her last, The Collected Poems of Muriel Rukeyser (published in 1978 by McGraw Hill,and updated by The University of Pittsburgh Press in 2005), what is a constant is her penchant for long narratives, their aching for humanity, their longing to tell humanity's story. Virtually all the poetic forms make their appearance in these works: free verse, sestina, sonnet, elegy. She recorded her time with an urgency and density (there are short poems as well, no less lacking in substance as the long ones), rare for a poet of any age.

In the revealing essay on her Jewishness that appeared in the Contemporary Jewish Record symposium titled Under Forty (1944), Rukeyser writes bitingly of her Reform origins: I grew up among a group of Jews who wished, more than anything else, I think, to be invisible.

Jews to whom she acknowledged a great debt: I sat under the shadowy dome during the drone of the watered-down sermon and the watered-down liturgical music, and I read the Bible. Its clash and poetry and nakedness, its fiery vision of conflict resolved only in God, were true to me, no matter what I was coming to believe about the reality of the world or power or divinity or death or love.

She would candidly admit: I don't know how far I am representative of any group in Jewish life.

No established group perhaps. But one can say a hundred years after her birth that she is still recognizable as a Jewish radical archetype, with the untamed energy that spills beyond a single allegiance, beyond the harness of a single place.

In her poem, For My Son, we hear the rich tumble of a voice that has no double in contemporary poetry.

You come from poets, kings, bankrupts, preachers, attempted bankrupts, builders of cities, salesmen,
the great rabbis, the kings of Ireland, failed drygoods storekeepers, beautiful women of the songs... ■

There's life after JDate

Encounter with dating site was similar to an episode of The Twilight Zone

BRUCE FREEDMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When I moved to Toronto, divorced and delighted, I initially stayed with my brother's family. It was wonderful. I got to spend some quality time with my nephews. But it wasn't enough. After a few weeks, I realized I needed to get out. I needed to meet grownups, people who would agree that six hours of Guitar Hero is excessive. And preferably people with long legs, flaming red hair and tattoos on the smalls of their backs.

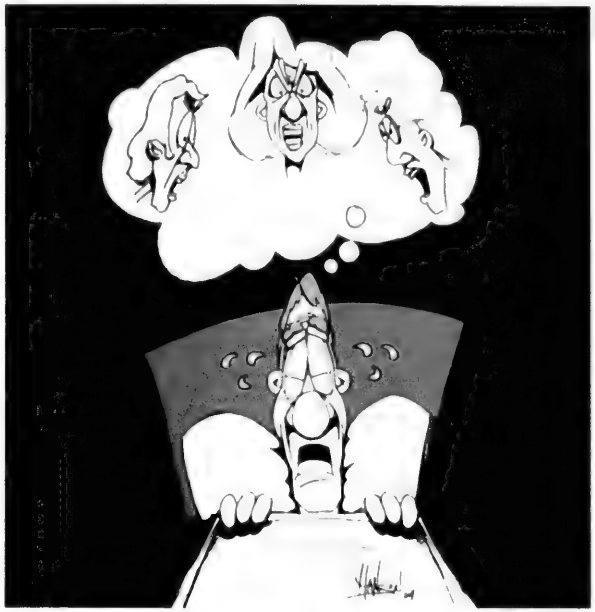
I'd heard about Lavalife and Matchmaker and this Internet dating phenomenon, but I'd never been on any of the websites. I met my future ex-wife back when Internet dating was still a novelty. I'd been told that Internet dating was no longer an embarrassment. Sure there were disaster stories, but there were success stories too. And one of my closest friends married the woman he met on JDate, an Internet dating site that caters to Jews. It seemed like a lot of harmless fun to me.

Now, I'm not a particularly good Jew. I'd dated only one Jewish woman in my life. So I figured that if I'm going to try Internet dating, I owed it to my mother to do it through JDate. So I set up an account, uploaded a couple of pictures of myself, and what happens? You know that old episode of The Twilight Zone where an entire town wakes up to discover they've lost a week of their lives because some aliens had kidnapped them and placed them in suspended animation?

That's what JDate did to me.

You may as well have removed that week from my life, because I can barely remember it. All I know is that during this period, I did not work, I did not go to the gym and I did not leave the house. I did not even go on any actual dates. I just sat in front of my computer reading Jewish women's profiles, responding to emails and eating too much cereal.

Have you ever played a video game for the first time against a friend who's been playing it for weeks? You know that moment where the game has just begun – and you're trying to figure out which button does what – and suddenly your friend comes running up behind you and blows you up with a rocket launcher? You're pleading for a grace period to learn how the controls work but every time you're reborn, he immediately shoots you. That's what JDate is like for the uninitiated. Within seconds of activating my profile, I was attacked. Instant messages were popping up like Bouncing Bettys. By the end of the first minute, I'd received three "flirts" and been "hot-listed" twice. I was overwhelmed with the attention.



I received over 50 emails in that first week

I received over 50 emails in that first week. I didn't actually have time to meet any of the authors, because I was too busy writing back. I had not yet learned the appropriate etiquette so I was responding to all inquiries – and I do mean all. I exchanged flirty email banter with everyone from a 54-year-old divorcée with two 17-year-old twins to a 290-pound student who was trying to decide her major. I just didn't know how to say no.

By week two, I had learned that I didn't need to know how to say "no" – not when I could simply ignore the email. This freed up some time for me to actually go on dates.

One thing I can safely say I have learned from those first few dates is that everybody has at least one good photo. Another thing I learned is that this is usually the photo that is shown on JDate. Some of these photos can be a bit dated. I learned this the hard way, when I sipped coffee one afternoon with a 65-year-old retiree. I really should have said no, but she looked so cute in the photo. I hadn't noticed the horse and buggy in the background.

My initial dating experiences were also tarnished because it took me some time to learn that there was a completely different language used among online daters. For instance, in the world of JDate there is no word for "fat." In each member's profile, there is a scroll-down menu with several possible descriptions for body-type, none of which actually reads "fat." Once you understand this reality, and have taken the time to learn the appropriate JDate diction, then you will do just fine. My tastes gravitated towards women who had selected lean/slender, athletic/fit or firm & toned. Even then, I had some surprises. Athletic/fit for the typical Jewish girl means she wears Lululemon when she's shopping.

There were also distinct rules of engagement, specific to Internet dating. One lesson I learned quickly is that you had better want to be a father. When filling in the profile, I was asked if I planned to have children? I mistakenly chose "maybe." I learned afterward that this was the wrong answer. One aspiring mom told me she could not go out with me unless I was more certain. I vehemently defended my "maybe," because how could I "plan" to have children if I had not yet met the right

Can Israel be both Jewish and democratic?

Gil Troy

I am consistently astounded by the simplistic slogans, the false polarities, the epidemic of idiocy that distorts discussions about Israel. In the 1970s, the Soviets and the Palestinians improvised what Daniel Patrick Moynihan called "the Big Red Lie," framing the national conflict between Jews and Palestinians as a racial one, claiming that Zionism is racism and that democratic, colour-blind Israel is somehow similar to racist, colour-obsessed South African apartheid.

The latest propaganda line has people debating another false choice: "Can Israel be both Jewish and democratic?" fools ask – and demagogues then try robbing Israel of its right to exist by catching Israel in some contradiction.

On one level, the answer is "of course not." If the question means can Israel be both completely Jewish – adhering to every minute medieval Jewish law – and completely democratic – following the purest, simplest form of a town meeting democracy – the answer clearly is "no."

This is partially because all countries combine ideas, structures, and systems, putting them in healthy tension. Canada does fully empower both the federal government and the provinces – but navigates between the two, sometimes artfully, sometimes awkwardly. The United States does not always honour majority rule nor does it always honour minority rights. However, by cherishing both values it charts its own path, for better and worse.

Moving beyond the rhetorical framework, realistically, the answer to the question is "of course." Israel is a state with a Jewish majority and certain Jewish characteristics that is also a democracy. Acknowledging those categories' fluidity, and the constant tensions inherent involved in governing, we can see many elements of "Jewish" and "democratic" shaping Israeli life.

That Israel even aspires to be democratic puts it in an exclusive club, which the Palestinians and most Arabs do not even try joining. It is impossible to read Israel's Declaration of Independence fairly without seeing a country that is deeply Jewish, rooting its legitimacy in the Bible and Jewish history, but also deeply democratic, offering civil rights to all its "inhabitants," aware that not all of them were Jewish – or even friendly and loyal to the new state in 1948.

So, let's move beyond demagogic debates. Let's stop trying to magnify whatever imperfections one finds in order to question Israel's very right to exist. Instead, let's ask the question more fairly, more elegantly. The proper question is, given Israel's aspiration to be a democratic Jewish state, what resonances does it experience and what shortcomings does it endure?

That kind of question opens up a fascinating inquiry rather than a hostile inquisition. My short answers would be:

1. Israel is clearly on the democratic spectrum, providing a stable civil society, rule of law, free elections, basic civil rights, freedom of speech and religion, independent courts, and an aggressive press – all of which allow for democracy's most miraculous asset, its self-correcting mechanism.

Israel is also clearly a Jewish state, living in a Jewish space, on Jewish time, with a public space that is deeply Jewish and not neutral, while trying not to be hostile to others. Of course, given that the Jews are a people, a Jewish state is like a French state, not a theocracy but the expression of a people with a particular language, culture, and yes, a religion too. It is perfectly valid for a majority in a nation-state to express some of its cultural and even religious heritage in public.

2. Nevertheless, there are tensions, contradictions, and shortcomings. The rabbinate is too intrusive regarding marriage and divorce. Israeli Arabs should feel fully equal as citizens in the Jewish democratic state of Israel. And the ultra-Orthodox minority should not use democratic interest group politics to demand too many rights – and subsidies – without fulfilling democratic responsibilities. But, unlike most, I see progress on all three major issues -- and I retain my deep faith in Israel's vibrant, sometimes exhausting democracy, to find the right balance… eventually. ■

Travelling Jewish and bumping into history

Sara Horowitz

As an adult, I bear a different kind of burden in travelling as a Jew, and no more so than when I travel to Europe. I experience travel in two different and sometimes discordant ways. On the one hand, I'm drawn to the same things that attract most travellers – cultural riches, breathtaking landscapes, culinary treats, architectural wonders and a sense of history. The last item – history – snags me, and brings up the other hand. Because on the other hand, I see places through Jewish eyes as well. Did Jews live here? Do they still? What intellectual, cultural, literary heritage did they create here? What happened to them? Sometimes the Jewish experience of place adds to and enriches the more general experience – in New York, for example. But in other places, the two sets of perceptions are at odds with one another.

I felt this doubleness acutely on a recent visit to in southern France. My husband and I were enjoying the pleasures of Aix-en-Provence, a charming city about a half hour north of Marseille, and a well-situated base for day trips to other charming places. Although we hadn't planned this as a Jewish trip, the historian in my husband couldn't be in proximity to such places as Avignon, Carpentras and Cavaillon without following the traces of Jewish history.

As he explained to me, during the period when Avignon became the alternate home for popes, Jews were invited to live there, even though they weren't welcome elsewhere in France. Referred to as "the Pope's Jews," they lived under papal protection. Their occupations were restricted, they had to wear distinctively marked clothing, they lived in restricted areas – but they could stay. Traces of their lives can be found in nearby Carpetras and Cavaillon, where 14th-century synagogues have been preserved. Early in the 16th century, Jews were expelled from Provence. Because of this, the buildings contain few artifacts. As in the rest of France, Jews began to return to Provence in the 17th century, and after the French Revolution, were accorded the rights of citizenship.

We thought we had covered "Jewish Provence," when we came upon a reference to a deportation camp in Provence itself. Established on the site of a former brick factory, Camp des Milles opened in 1939, first as an internment camp for anti-Nazi artists and intellectuals. By the early 1940s, it was a transit camp for Jews awaiting immigration papers to somewhere safe, and as that became increasingly difficult, as a deportation camp pending transportation to Auschwitz.

After the war, the family who owned the factory reclaimed it and resumed manufacturing. As part of the process of making the facility operational again, many traces of its function during the war were destroyed or obscured. There are, for example, no barracks to be seen. And most people seemed to have forgotten about the camp on a street right in town.

But in preparing it for its opening as a memorial site in 2012, its developers took pains to find traces of its former inmates – drawings or lettering on the wall, for example – that survived its postwar use as an active manufacturing plant. There is, as well, a memorial to the Jewish children deported from France. Camp des Milles is the only internment and deportation camp that is set up as a memorial site open to the public. Drancy, the transit camp just outside Paris, is now used as housing in a somewhat seedy neighbourhood. There's a memorial nearby. Of the three labour camps that existed in Paris itself during the war – a forgotten piece of history documented by French historian Jean-Marc Dreyfus – little trace remains.

The signage in Camp des Milles is in French only, an indication that the site is intended as a place of education and contemplation for French visitors. We saw school children and adult groups there. It speaks to a return to memory and conscience. ■

Just ignore Queers Against Israeli Apartheid

Adam Goldenberg

A few weeks ago, a guy I used to work with wrote a blog post comparing me to Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and David Irving.

I had just published an op-ed defending a woman's right to choose, in which I criticized the Catholic Church for meddling in Canadian politics. My ex-colleague apparently was not amused. He accused me of bigotry and hissed that I reminded him of neo-Nazis.

My grandparents are Holocaust survivors, and so his screed, as comically hyperbolic as it was, hit a nerve. I was annoyed, upset, outraged even. I wanted desperately to respond.

I didn't. In the end, I listened to friends who are much smarter than I, and kept my powder dry. The shmuck obviously wanted to make me mad – why else would he compare a Jewish writer to Holocaust deniers and neo-Nazis? – and fighting back would only have given him the attention that he evidently craved.

"I learned long ago, never to wrestle with a pig," George Bernard Shaw once reportedly said. "You get dirty, and besides, the pig likes it."

Enter Queers Against Israeli Apartheid. QuAIA has in recent years caused more controversy than any other participant in Toronto's Pride parade – which, for an event that includes a whole lot of naked people, is really saying something.

The group's message is painfully unsubtle. Israel, it asserts, is an apartheid state. It's offensive. It's ignorant. It's wrong. And, as Toronto prepares for this month's Pride festivities, it's not worth anyone's time.

In 2010, Toronto Pride organizers voted to ban the slur "Israeli apartheid," but later reversed course and allowed QuAIA to march. QuAIA then boycotted the parade in 2011. When they returned in 2012, B'nai Brith Canada filed a complaint, to no avail. Last year, Toronto city councillors devoted yet more hours to debating QuAIA's participation in Pride. The group marched anyway.

Genug shoyn. What's the point?

I admit, I've written before that QuAIA – whose message has as much to do with gay rights as an anti-abortion "Queers for Life" float would – has no place in Pride. I still think that's true. But I'm done arguing about it.

As threats to the Jewish people go, this one's fairly benign. Every year, our community's leaders go to the barricades to keep a few dozen activists out of a parade that's so crowded, it can be difficult to find one's own friends among the rainbow festoonery and rogue genitalia. Our well-intentioned defenders look like censors, and give QuAIA a taste of the free-speech martyrdom that, make no mistake, is their true objective.

Like an angry blogger who compares a Jewish columnist to neo-Nazis, a group whose name accuses Israel of the crime of apartheid isn't asking to be taken seriously. It's begging to be noticed.

And yet, year after year, we oblige. "The Pride event should not introduce hate and hate speech," B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant told Xtra, an LGBT community publication, last July. "Saying 'apartheid' is anti-Semitic. It's vile."

Even if it is, Dimant and others ultimately do Jews no favours by trying to turn their overt disgust into an outright ban: "The gay parade was initially conceived as a celebration. I don't think it should be politicized," Dimant said last year.

First of all, nobody calls it "the gay parade." Second, Pride has always been political. Its origins have less to do with "celebration" than with defiance. And, just like that, what should be a simple, one-sided condemnation – "demonizing Israel is ignorant and intolerant," and so forth – becomes a pointless debate about free speech and the history of the LGBT-rights movement.

QuAIA and its allies win that fight just by having it. For the Jewish community, meanwhile, the cure – repeated failed attempts at censorship – is ultimately worse than the disease.

So, if QuAIA claims a spot in this year's Pride parade, ignore them. Nothing will do more to provoke their outrage than denying them ours. ■

Jews, Tories and tikkun olam

Michael Taube

I've been writing columns since 1996. There are certain tricks of the trade when it comes to crafting a piece. Two of them are to be provocative and controversial.

This particular column will likely be one of the more provocative and controversial you're ever going to read in The CJN. It might make you angry, but I also hope it makes you think about preconceived notions and long-standing positions.

One of the first op-eds I ever wrote was for the Globe and Mail about the Jewish bias against political conservatism. It frustrated many left-wing Jews (which I had expected) and led to a barrage of letters to the editor and media requests (which was unexpected).

A couple of those letter writers caught my attention. They claimed it would be impossible for Jews to support right-leaning political parties in Canada. Why? Due to the principle of tikkun olam.

This Hebrew phrase from the Mishnah is roughly translated as "repairing the world" or "healing the world." While it represents different things to the Jewish community, tikkun olam has gradually become a battle cry for left-wing Jews. They interpret it as the need for social justice, and a requirement to help the needy and feed and clothe the poor.

In a Jewish left-winger's view, the only way to supposedly follow tikkun olam's principle is to support progressive ideas – and vote for progressive parties. Left-leaning parties such as the Liberals and NDP should be the only acceptable choices for all Canadian Jews. The right-leaning Tories, who oppose social justice and progressivism, were verboten.

I've seen this argument made many times since. Some comments were either in response to pieces I've written or attacks on many other right-leaning Jewish writers and pundits.

Enough is enough. Let's put an end to this train of thought.

I don't have an issue if Jews want to follow tikkun olam for personal reasons. If that's what they feel will make the world a better place, fine. I certainly don't believe in this principle, but I'll defend your right to support it.

At the same time, please stop this juxtaposition of tikkun olam with left-wing voting behaviour. Don't suggest or infer that Judaism commands you to vote for the Liberals, NDP, Greens and others. It doesn't.

For what it's worth, our Christian brethren also believe in charity, helping the poor and the needy. Somehow, they've voted for right-leaning political parties without being consistently reprimanded for not following biblical writings and traditions.

Meanwhile, using an ancient Hebrew phrase from the rabbinical period as a personal defence for modern voting patterns is preposterous. The first political parties originated in 17th-century England. Trust me, tikkun olam was the furthest thing from their minds – and there simply isn't any association, past or present.

Canadian Jews are therefore free to believe in whatever they wish, and support whomever they choose. In the 2011 federal election, more than half voted for the Tories. You know, the ones who don't believe in tikkun olam.

Contrary to popular left-wing myths, many small "c" conservatives want to help the poor and disenfranchised. Not by paying lip service to social justice, mind you. Rather, by giving society a hand up, and not a hand out.

That's why conservatives champion the free market and personal liberty. That's why they support tax credits and broad-based tax relief. That's why they believe in maintaining public social services and balancing them with private initiatives. That's why they endorse programs such as workfare and school vouchers. The list goes on.

Hence, a conservative's ultimate goal is to improve society and repair the perceived political and economic damage left behind by previous progressive governments. To take a page from tikkun olam, that's the way we want to heal the world. ■

The Muslim Brotherhood in Canada: the next steps

TOM QUIGGIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The recent report titled The Muslim Brotherhood in North America began as an examination of extremist views spreading in Canada. The Muslim Brotherhood is perhaps the most effective of such organizations in Canada.

We require a national level, intelligent discussion in Canada on the role of the Muslim Brotherhood and similar extremist groups. The federal government bears this responsibility. The United Kingdom is currently having a similar inquiry.

Should this group be allowed government accreditation? Should it get public grant money? Can it lobby the government or should it be allowed to have charity status for its multiple organizations? Once one charity has lost its charitable status for funding terrorism, should those charities having common board members be delisted as charities? Should the Muslim Brotherhood be allowed to run schools?

These questions should be raised as individuals such as Muslim Brotherhood "Masu" (leader) Jamal Badawi advocates wife beating in Canada as an acceptable practice. CAIR-CAN (now the National Council of Canadian Muslims) founding board member Shahina Siddiqui has argued that polygamy is acceptable and advocates for it in Canada. While the majority of Islam has been working to eradicate the practice of female genital mutilation, the Muslim Brotherhood has consistently supported it and organized against the criminalization of the practice in 2008. It advocated for it when elected in Egypt 2012.

Palestinian demonstrators shout slogans during a protest in support of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt last August. FLASH 90

Additionally, charities with Muslim Brotherhood connections such as IRFAN (the International Relief Fund for the Afflicted and Needy) and the Islamic Society of North America's Development Foundation lost their charitable status for funding terrorist groups in Kashmir and the Middle East, despite being warned against such practices. In addition to terrorism funding, IRFAN defrauded Canadians by raising money for natural disasters (such as the South Asian tsunami of 2004) and then sending the money to Hamas.

Why has London, Ont., among other cities, become a radicalization point where young Canadians set off to kill and be killed in foreign lands to serve extremism? Is there a strong Ikhwani (Brotherhood) connection to this city?

The failure to examine political extremism is costly. The Air India disaster is one example, although it remains unclear as to what lessons have been learned. Charities of an extremist nature procure funds in Canada while groups still use Canada for weapons procurement.

The federal government needs to initiate an inquiry into extremist organizations. Outright bans may be effective, but that is questionable given that the Muslim Brotherhood's Jerusalem Fund for Human Services was blocked from charitable status in 1999, but then the Ikhwani simply set up IRFAN in 2000 as an alternative.

One useful side effect of an inquiry would be a closer look at who speaks for the majority of Canadian Muslims who do not support the Muslim Brotherhood. All too often, we are told that such-and-such group "speaks on behalf of Canadian Muslims" when it is clear that they speak only for their own cause.

As a court appointed expert on terrorism and intelligence in the criminal, civil and immigration courts, it is clear to me that defining extremism and identifying its adherents is a difficult but not impossible task. I have testified against those who have posed a security threat to Canada. Alternatively, my role in other cases was to defend Muslims in Federal Court and to the Immigration and Refugee Board Court when their statements or activities did not constitute a threat.

An effective approach would ensure that such groups do not get charitable status, nor should they get government accreditation or public funds. The government should also educate itself so adherents of extremist groups are not named to government panels or boards. In short, the government of Canada should not be plugging an amplifier into the propaganda of foreign extremist organizations, nor should it fund them.

Defining and defending Canada against extremist views is both a duty and responsibility of the government of Canada. A timely investigation into such matters is an absolute necessity. ■

Swastikas spray-painted on home, community centre

SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two buildings in the Bathurst and Sheppard area were spray-painted with swastikas in separate incidents last week.

First, the Borochov Cultural Centre on Codsell Avenue was targeted with a swastika during Shavuot, then a private home nearby on Combe Avenue was violated in the same way.

Homeowner Beth Karstadt said she drove right by the graffiti on the side of her house without noticing it when she took her children to school June 6.

After she returned, a police officer knocked on her door and pointed out the swastika to Karstadt and her husband Jay Silverstein. The officer said a passing motorist had notified police about the vandalism. The officer also informed them of the Borochov Centre incident.

"My first feelings were absolute shock," Karstadt said. "Then, for a brief second, there was fear, because you don't know who's done it and if they know you. Then my emotions turned to anger. I am so angry that in this day and age, we still have to deal with this."

The attending officer from 32 Division advised the family to cover up the swastika until it could be removed, in order to protect their own and neighbouring properties from copycats.

The Toronto Police Service publishes an annual hate crimes statistical report. The three most targeted groups since 2006 have been the Jewish, black, and gay and lesbian communities. In 2013, the Jewish community had the most incidents.

"Hate-bias crimes have a disproportionally greater impact upon their victims than other types of crimes, as they don't only victimize the individual, but the entire community," said Det. Const. Kiran Bisla, acting director of the Toronto Police hate crimes unit.

Police said finding the perpetrators won't be easy.

"It represents a challenge while investigating, because neither the victim nor any witnesses are present at the time the offence takes place," Bisla said.

"Mischief to property offences represent a significant portion of the occurrences reported and unfortunately, the perpetrators are not often caught," she added.

While the family is frightened, Karstadt said, "we are certainly not going to let the acts of a coward frighten us away." ■

New single parent support group takes off

Erin Dym

When my husband and I first separated, I was in a state of shock. My seemingly perfect life was suddenly ripped apart by forces I never saw coming. I was 32 years old and had two toddlers. I didn't know how to change a light bulb, never mind pay the bills. How was I going to cope with the demands of work, put on a happy face for my little boys, make sense of legalese and – the biggest obstacle of all – learn to date? There were times I was so confused and lonely that I cried myself to sleep. When I'd wake up in the morning, I'd realize that I hadn't stopped.

But after a couple of months of allowing myself to wallow, I decided that enough was enough. Instead of asking, "Why me?" I began to ask, "Why not me?" I was not going to be a victim. My boys needed a happy mom, and I became determined to figure it all out. I made it my mission to rediscover myself, become more independent and self-sufficient, to live life, to take chances, and do whatever it took to make myself the best possible person and mom I could be. I wanted to become someone I could be proud of and admire – someone my kids would, too.

> After a couple of months of allowing myself to wallow, I decided that enough was enough.

I started seeing an outstanding therapist. I relied on my family and friends for support. I began taking boxing classes. Who knew that punching something could feel so therapeutic? I wanted to spend as little time as possible being angry or resentful. I mentally put all my bad thoughts on a piece of paper, scrunched it up and threw it to the back of my head. I just let it all go. I started fresh. I learned to hire and fire babysitters, manage money, get raccoons out of my garage, take my kids on road trips, deal with flat tires and walk in heels. It's been an amazing year. And I knew something good would come of it all.

Starting a support group with my friend Simone, also an amazing, inspiring single mom, was such a natural progression. Simone and I met early in our separations, and we became inseparable. When nobody else understood what it was like to deal with lawyers and finances and questions from our kids about divorce, we did. We were there for each other. We'd help one another pick out clothes for important dates, we met at the gym for stress-busting workouts, and had dinner play dates with our kids, dividing up the leftovers afterward so that we could each feed our little families the next day, too. We cried. We laughed. We laughed till we cried, and cried till we laughed.

Once we each had more than a year of experience as single parents, we felt ready to recreate this supportive environment for others. In April, our support group idea came to fruition as The Ex-Files. We decided that this wasn't the place to bash your ex or be depressed. It would be a cool, fun group where single parents and their friends could get together, meet others, have fun and be inspired by one another's strength.

We quickly got to work, planning a "whine and cheese" for May 13. We invited everyone we knew and immediately, the positive feedback started rolling in. There was no other group like it. It seemed we had found our niche. The cause really resonated. People donated food, drinks, prizes and helped make our inaugural event a success.

And was it ever successful. My therapist, Andrea Share, led a workshop for about 20 of us who gathered in my living room. Within minutes of meeting, there was an outpouring of raw emotion. It was like being in a reality TV show where everything was real, meaningful and gut-wrenching. I was amazed at how intimate and personal it became, how much we were able to listen and support one another. By the end of the evening, Simone and I were completely overwhelmed, but in the best possible way.

"I think that was really good," I told my friend.

Simone smiled back.

"It was amazing," she said. ■

Four high-level players from the Israel Tennis Centers were in Canada and the United States over the past couple of weeks on a trip of a lifetime. Pictured in Toronto with coach and chaperone Asaf Yamin, centre, are, from left, Raz Hershkovitz, Yarden Simon, Yoav Nir and Muhammad Uthman.

Tennis centre brings youngsters together in Israel

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Little Muhammad Uthman doesn't speak much English, but he's got his shpiel down pat.

In it, he introduces himself, tells listeners where he's from and that he's as happy as can be to represent the Israel Tennis Centers' (ITC) branch in Jerusalem.

As a 12-year-old from the Israeli Arab village of Beit Tzafafa, near Jerusalem, he's on the trip of a lifetime, visiting communities in Toronto, New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia and Washington. Along with three other young tennis prodigies who train at the ITC, accompanied by their chaperon and coach Asaf Yamin, they put on tennis exhibitions and gave a human face to the statistics about the ITC which are formidable in their own right.

Some 20,000 Israeli kids, 16 and under, take advantage of tennis programs offered at the ITC's 14 locations each year. Since it opened its doors in 1976, 400,000 youngsters have benefited from its programs.

The ITC not only trains kids in the sport, but it has become an important community resource in helping youngsters prepare for adult life. It keeps youth at risk on the proper path, it gives immigrants an entry into Israeli society, and it provides help to children with special needs, such as autism, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and Down syndrome.

Helping build bridges through sport is another important function readily adopted by ITC. Kids from a variety of backgrounds, including Arabs, Jews, olim from the former Soviet Union and from Ethiopia, are brought together in an environment where they have fun.

Uthman, who studies at Hand in Hand, a school for Jews and Arabs, said people in his village admire the abilities he's developed as a member of the ITC's high performance program. And they have no problem that most of the kids he plays with are Jews. "I love playing tennis with friends," he said through a translator.

His older sister, Sewar, 13, preceded him in the ITC. Sewar is a nationally ranked player in her age group and Muhammad is in the top 40 or 50 in his age cohort.

Raz Hershkovitz, 12, plays at the ITC in Arad. "When I go to tennis, I feel so good," she said.

In playing at the ITC, Hershkovitz is carrying on a family tradition. Her mother, Leah, immigrated to Israel when she was eight, walking for a month from Ethiopia with her parents and grandparents. Beset by Sudanese bandits, her mother's grandmother and grandfather were killed on the way.

Leah took up the sport when she was eight. "I love the atmosphere, the way people treat each other with respect and dignity," she said.

Yarden Simon, 15, plays at the ITC in Be'er Sheva. Her mom, dad and grandfather all played there as well.

"It makes me feel confident in myself," she said. "The tennis allows me to be independent. I love to come to the ITC. It makes me happy with my life."

Yoav Nir is 15 going on 20. He trains at the ITC's high performance program in Ramat Hasharon. He lives in a dorm, prepares some of his own meals and already has his future planned out – at least for the next few years, including applying to the most elite unit in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

He's ranked first in Israel in the 16 and under category.

"His mental strength is amazing," said Yamin. "He's a big fighter. He's a typical Israeli for me."

As an elite athlete, he's got a schedule to match. Up at 5:50 a.m. each day, he trains for two hours before school. Then it's a shower and he makes his own breakfast. After school, at 1:15 p.m., there's another 2 1/2 hours of practice, followed by fitness training in other sports.

Nir doesn't mind the grind. Actually, he revels in it. He loves the tennis immersion and talking about the sport with other guys in the program.

It's also given him something he might not otherwise have. "It makes you able to deal with difficulties, set up a schedule and prioritize," he said.

These are important life lessons, said Yamin, 31. Himself a former elite player in his teens, he put that part of his life on hold when he joined the Israeli Defence Forces. He was a member of an elite unit – he won't say which one – and he feels the lessons learned at the ITC helped prepare him for that.

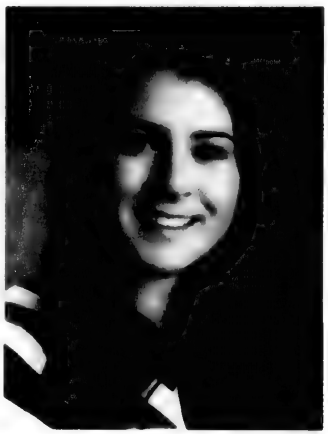
Not that there was any military training involved, but the development of good work habits, loyalty and discipline are important life lessons you get at the ITC, he said.

Last year's event at Maple Downs Golf and Country Club raised money to construct a bomb shelter at the ITC in Haifa. This year's visit included a fundraiser for shelters in Kiryat Shmonah and Sajur.

Israel's first tennis arena, the Canada Stadium in Ramat Hasharon, was built with funds raised by Canadian Jews. ■

Westmount students organize 30-Hour Famine

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca



Rebecca Feldman had never given much thought to activism until several weeks ago when her world issues teacher at Westmount Collegiate gave her class an assignment called "Change the World."

It required the students to break into groups and choose a cause they considered important, as well as a method to raise awareness for it.

Now the Grade 12 student is excited about the campaign she and her five fellow group members are launching to teach their fellow students about world hunger: the 30-Hour Famine.

The awareness initiative is affiliated with World Vision, a non-profit Christian relief agency that works to overcome Third World poverty and injustice. Every year since the 1970s, students and youth across North America and elsewhere in the developed world have abstained from food for 30 hours to raise awareness for children struggling with hunger in developing countries.

After their class met the World Vision youth and student engagement leader for Ontario at a conference, Feldman's group decided to hold its own version of the 30-Hour Famine at Westmount on June 11. (The official World Vision event happened in April.)

Their plan is to set up a promotional booth in the school lobby and spend the two days prior to the initiative educating their fellow students about world hunger and encouraging them to make a pledge to fast. World Vision will support the group by providing it with educational posters and other promotional materials.

"We chose to focus on hunger, because we feel it's a big area of concern," Feldman says.

"We don't think many people know that, because we live in such a privileged area. So we want people to know that not everyone has the money to buy simple things like water and food. We wanted to bring awareness to our school."

She specifies that, though she and her group members will fast for the entire 30 hours, they're only asking that their schoolmates fast for the duration of the school day, from 8:40 a.m. to 3:20 p.m.

"It's easier for people to pledge just for the school day," she explains.

She also notes that fasting during a school day is significant, because, "for people all around the world – for example in Africa – that's one of their challenges, to travel for hours to get to school and sit in classes while constantly hungry. It's a daily struggle constantly on their minds."

> We want people to know that not everyone has the money to buy simple things like water and food.
> Rebecca Feldman
> Westmount Student

In addition to fasting, the group will co-ordinate a school-wide food drive, collecting non-perishable food items that they will later donate to a Toronto food bank.

Feldman says that in addition to co-ordinating and promoting the event, her group is expected to produce a video that endorses the 30-Hour Famine and gives background information on world hunger. Further, they will be graded on a social media campaign, which entails using Facebook, Twitter and Instagram to spread the word about their cause.

Feldman, who is planning to attend the University of Guelph to study public policy and criminal justice in the fall, said the project has piqued her interest in social justice and made activism seem more accessible.

"I've always wanted to get involved [in causes], but it was difficult because I didn't know how or what to do. Doing something like this really opens your eyes up and makes you want to help people." ■

Brain trust gala commemorates Gerry Pencer

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust held its 14th Annual Brain Trust Gala on May 28 with 560 guests celebrating "A Night at the Castle" at Casa Loma and raising $800,000.

Gerry Pencer, philanthropist and CEO of soft-drink maker Cott Corporation, was diagnosed with a brain tumour in 1997 and died the following year at age 53.

During his illness, he searched for information, answers, treatment options and support for both himself and his family, all of which were hard to find. He set out to change that and was determined to do it big, the way he did everything.

"My dad, Gerry Pencer, was larger than life. He always thought outside the box, living 100 years in his 53 years of life," said Holly Pencer-Bellman, executive director of the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

Before his death, Gerry pledged $4 million to finance what is now Canada's most comprehensive, multidisciplinary brain tumour centre, dedicated to revolutionizing the way patients are diagnosed, educated, informed, treated, and supported throughout their illness.

The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumour Centre (PBC) at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital was established in 1998 and has grown to become the largest multidisciplinary clinic in Canada, and one of the largest centres of its kind in the world, treating more than 200 patients weekly.

To date, the trust has raised close to $11 million to help find a cure for brain cancer and provide care and support for brain tumour patients and their families.

Every day, 27 Canadians are diagnosed with a brain tumour and an estimated 55,000 Canadians are surviving with one. There are over 120 different types, making effective treatment very complicated.

As president of the PBC, Nancy Pencer plays a hands-on role.

"It's really important to me to spend time talking with the families, and putting a face to a name. We've been through this. It's not easy. It's scary, and I feel I can contribute," she said.

"People have described Gerry as an entrepreneur and one of the great innovators in Canadian business, but what I saw was the impact that he had on his family. The way his family has come together and continues to with such passion and support is, I think, the greatest testament that any man or woman can leave."

Lynne Terry, a patient at the PBC, was diagnosed in 2006 with oligodendroglioma, a rare and incurable form of brain cancer.

"I was given five to 10 years, and here I am knocking on the door of eight years! When you walk into the PBC, there are smiling receptionists, there are doctors, nurses, volunteers and counsellors, all there to help. It changes lives for the better," she said.

"We are making progress in this disease. There has been a very significant change in outcome for patients with a variety of brain tumours in the last 15 to 20 years, and that has been very gratifying. People are living longer with this disease," said Dr. Warren Mason, the PBC's medical director.

The trust's annual galas are known for their uniquely themed events, raising both awareness and funds to help finance state-of-the-art treatment and research at the PBC.

Attendees were entertained by such things as the Jester's Cabaret, a casino where they were given a special currency to buy chips for the casino, raffle tickets or to bid on surprise pop-up items that were auctioned throughout the evening. Couples could also renew their wedding vows at the Cherub's Chapel of Love or have their fortune taken at the Mystic Lair.

"Gerry loved to party. He would have loved this gala and all that it represents," Pencer-Bellman said. ■

NATIONAL

Judge voids neo-Nazi sympathizer's will

CJN STAFF

An American neo-Nazi group cannot inherit the estate of a New Brunswick man, a court in that province ruled June 5.

In a 43-page decision, Justice William Grant of the Court of Queen's Bench invalidated the will of the late Harry Robert McCorkill, a retired chemistry professor, who bequeathed all of his assets to the National Alliance, a West Virginia-based racist and anti-Semitic group.

Grant ruled that such a bequest must be voided because the National Alliance "stands for principles and policies... that are both illegal and contrary to public policy in Canada."

Grant stated that the group's propaganda "would unavoidably lead to violence" because it "incites hatred of various identifiable groups which they deem to be non-white and therefore unworthy."

David Koschitzky

Its founder was William Pierce, who wrote the condemned novel The Turner Diaries in 1978, which advocated a race war to eradicate non-whites and Jews from the United States.

> We are fortunate that the National Alliance is a severely diminished group, barely holding onto its shrinking membership.
> David Koschitzky
> CIJA

McCorkill of Saint John, N.B., who died in 2004, became a National Alliance member in 1998 and lived in its compound. His estate is valued at about $280,000.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which was an intervenor in the case along with B'nai Brith Canada, commended Grant for his judgment.

"This was a strong statement indicating that it is against Canadian public policy to bequeath money to organizations that spread hate," said CIJA president David Koschitzky. "Today, we are fortunate that the National Alliance is a severely diminished group, barely holding onto its shrinking membership.

"The threat was that an injection of about a quarter-million dollars might have breathed new life into this dying organization. Let this decision stand as a stark reminder that we must remain ever vigilant in our efforts to not allow such hate mongers the oxygen to spread their toxic vitriol."

McCorkill's sister, Isabelle Rose McCorkill, had gone to court to block the inheritance. ■

Vancouver Jews celebrate eight over 80

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

In the last week of May the Vancouver Jewish community gathered to honour the contributions of eight individuals who helped build the community to what it is today.

The honorees were selected based on a questionnaire that had been previously distributed among 6,000 members of the Jewish community. In it, respondents were asked to nominate individuals or couples in the 80-plus age range who they considered visionaries, achievers and role models.

"We thought it would be wonderful to honour people of this age," says Dvori Balshine, development director at the Louis Brier Aged Foundation, which oversees the Jewish seniors home and hospital in Vancouver. "It brings dignity and respect to these people."

The questionnaire generated over 92 nominations of 64 people, all of them worthy recipients, she says.

Reducing the list to eight took hours and hours of discussion, she admitted.

"We wanted to honour individuals who are vibrant to this day and still giving of themselves today," she says.

Those selected were individuals and couples whose work eclipsed the limelight as they built Jewish libraries, fundraised, established a University of British Columbia Judaic studies program, aided Jewish seniors, built a Holocaust centre and contributed in a number of ways to the vibrant heartbeat that is Jewish Vancouver.

The honorees included Stanford and Seda Korsch, Samuel and Frances Belzberg, Dr. Arthur and Arlene Hayes, Rita and Marvin Weintraub, Jimmy White, Rita Akselrod, Serge Haber and Chaim Kornfeld.

Once the board at Louis Brier had selected the honorees, Balshine and Mel Moss, event chairs, set about organizing an event that would be utterly different from the norm. "Usually I hate events because they're all exactly the same," Moss said. "Rubber chicken dinner, and 100 speeches and thank yous. I wanted to have a party that would entertain honorees and attendees, a fun event that would honour those people who made the community what it is."

The event on a Sunday evening at the Vancouver Courthouse was staged as a radio broadcast from the late 1940s with radio hosts, an orchestra and a trio of female harmony singers. During the meal waiters morphed into a flash mob, dancing and singing to popular 1940s music before an audience of 350. "People went crazy and the honorees loved it," says Moss.

The campaign's million-dollar goal was exceeded, and the money will support Louis Brier for the next two years, enhancing the lives of its residents. Moreover, the cost of the tribute event was entirely underwritten by sponsors, which meant all funds raised could go directly to the campaign coffers. The development company Ivanhoe Cambridge-Westbank was the largest sponsor at $75,000. Other sponsors included Global Securities, Montecristo Jewellers, ZLC Financial Group, Realteach and GFS.cc. ■

Funds raised

At the annual meeting of the Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, funds raised were earmarked for the Kiryat Bialik Early Intervention Centre, which will serve people with disabilities in the Haifa region. Shown presenting a cheque for $36,000 to David Marcu, left, executive director of Israel Elwyn (Jerusalem), are Dayle Levine, centre, vice-chair of Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, and Friends treasurer David Rechtsman.

B.C. entrepreneur develops plastic currency

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

If there's one act of tikkun olam to which David Katz is dedicated, it's an effort to clean up the oceans and waterways of the world by recycling and reprocessing plastic waste.

The 45-year-old Port Moody, B.C.-based founder of The Plastic Bank just returned from Greece, where he was awarded the Global Citizen of the Year Award from the Entrepreneurs Organization. The award recognizes an entrepreneur who is making a mark on the global landscape, impacting communities, inspiring support and effecting positive change.

Katz's approach to the cleanup of plastic at the world's shorelines is innovative, and if it succeeds, its potential is huge. The idea is that waste pickers in the world's most poverty stricken countries will collect plastic garbage from their shorelines and deliver it to reprocessing facilities where they'll receive a credit at the Plastic Bank. They can then use the credit towards education, loans and access to 3D print shops where that plastic can be transformed into tools, parts and household items.

Katz is engaged in a pilot project with Ciuda Saludable in Peru, an organization that works with waste-picker communities to increase the volume of plastics collected. He's in partnership talks with similar organizations in Columbia and has had partnership requests from organizations in 40 different countries to date.

Back at home, he worked with the University of British Columbia to develop an extruder, which creates recycled plastic 3D printing filament. He's also working with a local plastic reprocessor to create Social Plastic, a brand of recycled plastic. Katz hopes to convince companies to purchase it as a socially responsible alternative to creating new plastics.

"There's enough plastic in the world right now that we would never have to make more of it," he explains. "And once it's reprocessed, the plastic doesn't degrade, which means it can be used for a wide variety of purposes and continue to be upcycled. It could be turned into fibre for clothing, or into prosthetics."

Lush Cosmetics is one of the companies that has shown an interest in using Social Plastic for use in their cosmetics tubs, and at the time of publication, Katz was awaiting the final paperwork on Lush's participation. Convincing companies to come on board with the concept of Social Plastic may be challenging, though. "Potential customers are concerned that once they start using social plastics, they'll always have to use it," he says.

> "We're hoping that by turning plastic waste into a currency that can be exchanged, we can help lift people out of poverty, and transition them into a self-sustaining life of entrepreneurship"
> David Katz
> CEO, the Plastic Bank

Katz says he's always been drawn to the shore, and with that attraction has come an exposure to its continuous degradation. "It's a symbol of the global catastrophe occurring because of people's misunderstanding of environmental issues," says Katz. "We're hoping that by turning plastic waste into a currency that can be exchanged, we can help lift people out of poverty, and transition them into a self-sustaining life of entrepreneurship."■

Early intervention is key for kids with special needs

sshefa@thecjn.ca

When Faige Oppenheimer's sixth child was unexpectedly born with Down syndrome, she wasn't sure what to do next.

Despite numerous pre-natal sonograms, her doctors didn't detect that Shira, now three years old, had Down syndrome because she doesn't have a heart problem – one of the most common markers.

In addition to coping with the life-changing news, Oppenheimer said she received very little support and guidance from the hospital staff about what to do next.

"No one said anything to me. I didn't get a booklet or a pamphlet from the [Canadian Down Syndrome Society], a where-to, a how-to… nothing. Not a social worker came into my room, not a doctor. They ignored me," she recalled.

When she brought Shira home from the hospital, she was inundated with phone calls from well-intentioned friends about what she should do.

"I had one person tell me, 'I have a child with Down syndrome – you have to start therapy right away!' And then another said, 'You must do this therapy,' and another recommended another therapy and I remember saying, 'Thank you so much, but for right now, for one month, until I recuperate from having a baby… if I decide not to do therapy for the first one month of my baby's life, as a mother, that is my decision.'"

Shira Oppenheimer

But when she heard about Zareinu Educational Centre's Infant Intervention Program, she decided to meet with Ellen Babbin, the program's infant interventionist and co-ordinator.

Oppenheimer met with Babbin when Shira was just a few weeks old, and learned about the program, which caters to children with a variety of developmental disabilities, including Down syndrome, cerebral palsy, and global delay.

The program runs twice a week with a team of seven professionals: an infant interventionist, a speech pathologist, an occupational therapist, a physiotherapist, a music therapist, a social worker and a program assistant.

Although Babbin insisted that the earlier therapy begins the better, Oppenheimer opted to enrol Shira at Zareinu when she was about five months old.

"I wanted my kids to enjoy the baby and be happy with the baby and have a good time and I wanted my husband to have time to adjust," Oppenheimer said.

She said her daughter thrived in the program, and it became apparent to her very quickly that early intervention is key.

"There is a lot of research on this now that says the brain is capable of being shaped and molded by experience.

A disabled person can make a positive contribution

EDDIE RICE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Many children died during the polio epidemic of the late 1940s and early 1950s. Thankfully, I was one of the lucky ones.

I was 21 months old when I contracted polio in June 1950 and spent the next 18 months in a medical ventilator called an "iron lung." As a youngster growing up in Long Island, N.Y., I used double leg braces up to the hip and two full-length crutches to keep me mobile. Physical therapy was constant during the first few years. My lower body took the brunt of the viral attack, while my upper body made a full recovery.

My parents, who were Holocaust survivors, sent me to a "regular" school so that I would learn how to participate and thrive in the real world. They never made me feel like I was disabled so I never looked at myself that way either. I wanted to be like every other kid, and I relied on my outgoing personality and sense of humour to help me fit in. I developed a thick skin to people's negative attitudes and a quick wit to combat it when the situation arose.

I had lots of friends. Though kids can be mean sometimes, I can't recall anyone ever saying anything rude to my face.

> I've concluded that those who don't know someone with a disability really don't have a clear understanding of my life, its challenges and its benefits.

However, one instance stands out. I was about eight years old and the school bully tried to pick a fight with me, but when I dropped my crutches and made a fist he ran away. Everyone wanted to carry my books between classes (perhaps because it meant they could leave class five minutes early!), and I still remain close with my schoolmates today.

People sometimes feel sorry for themselves when they go through difficult times. I was no exception, but my positive attitude soon brought me back to reality. I graduated and worked as a prosthetist and later, when Post-Polio Syndrome struck, I became a businessman. I served as chairman for the National Council of Jewish Women's Task Force on Jewish Persons with Disabilities. I've been an active member of B'nai Brith Canada for more than 40 years. I even spent 16 years telling jokes at Yuk Yuk's Comedy Club (they called me "the only sit-down stand-up comic in the business") and was able to show people that even someone with a disability can be funny. And I'm married to a wonderful woman, Harriet - she's the reason my heart beats - and we have seven grandchildren.

During various stages of my life I've often wondered what people thought when they saw me. I've concluded that those who don't know someone with a disability really don't have a clear understanding of my life, its challenges and its benefits. Sure, it's natural for people to stare at me since I have something extra for them to look at. But what angers me are those who can't see beyond my crutches and envision what I can't do as opposed to what I can do. You can change most people's attitude but others will never accept you. It takes a certain level of intelligence that allows them to accept reality.

I strongly believe that given opportunity, accessibility, and education, a person with a disability can be a positive contributor to society. It's also important that they build their self-confidence so they can get out of their shell and experience new ideas, new feelings and new people, provide a better life for themselves, and maximize their potential.

In 1998 I was appointed chairman of the Ontarians with Disabilities Sub-Committee, League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. Working with other disability organizations, we were instrumental in getting the province to enact the Accessibility for Ontarians with Disabilities Act (AODA) in 2005.

Though Post-Polio Syndrome has forced me to take early retirement and use a scooter, I remain as active as I can. I currently volunteer as an accessibility consultant, working with synagogues and public institutions to advise them on new construction or how to retrofit their existing buildings because current building codes do not meet the real-world needs required by people with disabilities. People are extremely receptive – it's just that, through no fault of their own, they don't know what to do or what's needed.

The more barriers that are removed, and the more disabled people who are integrated into society, the more the public will realize that they have a major contribution to make. ■

Important to be your child's advocate

So of course, the big push is, let's get them in there as early as we can [in] the critical period," said Babbin, who has held her position with Zareinu for the past 17 years.

"The plasticity of the brain is maximal during the first two years of life. It doesn't mean that the brain can't change later, but I think what the research shows is that the peak effect on development and learning happens during the critical period."

Zareinu staff work with the children to improve their fine motor skills, gross motor skills, communication skills, cognitive and social skills.

"When you come into our classroom it's a busy place, it's bright, it's noisy, there are parents, there are therapists, there's music, so they get used to being in a group [setting]. The earlier the exposure, obviously, the better," Babbin said.

Oppenheimer said she is grateful for the Zareinu program and its staff.

"Every therapist, teacher and assistant is hand-picked. They are so warm, they are so giving. They focus on each child, giving them what they need," Oppenheimer said, adding that the program is also beneficial to the parents.

"Mothers also need time to process what we're going through, talk to other people about what they're going through, get ideas, connect. As much as friends can be there for you and try to be helpful, they just don't have any idea," she said.

She said the advice she would give to other mothers coping with a special needs child, is not to forget to take care of themselves.

"If you're not taking care of yourself, you can't give to your child. You'll feel burnt out, stressed and depressed. It doesn't mean you have to take hours and hours of self-indulgence. If it means that at the end of the day, when the baby is sleeping and you want to take the phone off the hook and sink into the tub with a book and be unavailable, you're not available... You have to do things that re-energize you."

She also emphasized the importance of being your child's advocate and trusting your instincts.

"If you're not going to stand up for your child, no one else will. This is not a time to be shy. If you feel like it's not working well with your therapist, speak up. You are entitled, just like anyone else, to get the best care."

But most important, she said, is to remember to enjoy your child.

"Don't forget to hug them, love them. Be the mommy also, don't just be the therapist all day." ■

Rude awakening followed use of JDate woman. I even offered to leave my condoms at home on our first date, to prove my sincerity about impregnating her.

I finally started to get the hang of it. And while my dating life improved, I never came close to meeting that next love of my life. These so-called dates felt like job interviews. And while I got pretty good at expressing the top three reasons I'd make a good father or turning my weaknesses into strengths, there was never any real connection. It just wasn't fun.

Certainly not as much as fun as simply exploring the website. The truth is, emailing all those potential mates was far more exciting than actually meeting them. The possibilities were exhilarating, the reality less so. What these sites were really offering was the dream. And sometimes the only way to keep the dream alive is to keep your eyes closed.

One night while I was sleeping, I had a dream of a different sort. In my nightmare, I saw dozens of angry female faces floating over my still and silent body. Which brings me to instant messaging, the bane of any new user's existence. Picture this: you're minding your own business, trying to think of something clever to say in your next email, when suddenly out of nowhere, a little box floats across the computer screen. Inside the box is a picture of a woman, say FLOWER4U123, with an attached flashing caption:

"FLOWER4U123 would like to instant message you. Do you accept?"

You've got two choices: "yes" or "no." If you choose nothing the box eventually will go away, but it takes a very long time. I always felt my pulse racing when that box appeared. I never had the heart to click "no" because then the sender would receive an automatic message, saying that I refused her instant message. So I did nothing. The worst part about it was that the picture in the box was usually a cropped close-up of the smiling woman's face. So it looked like some disembodied, cackling head floating on my screen.

Sometimes, I'd open up another window to get away but the head actually followed me to the next page. On one particularly stormy night, I had three heads floating across my screen. It was like something out of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. I ran from the room.

About a month after I started using JDate, I had a rude awakening. I'd received emails from over 50 women in that first week alone, but after that initial flood of interest for the new boy in town, the excitement wore off. No new emails came my way. I'd log onto the site looking for new faces, trying to stir up some interest, but it was no use. I now recognized many members, and they recognized me. We'd been down this road before. For a while, I kept emailing my initial "relationships" to keep the dream alive. But it wasn't the same. I'd lost them: my angels, my flock, my girls.

In the beginning, I felt invincible, omnipotent, like I was the king of the world. The dates may have been uneventful, but the potential was always there. But now even that feeling was gone. JDate left me broken, a shadow of my former self. Perhaps it was truly time for me to move on.

Still, I was grateful for the experience. Internet dating may have been a tease, but in giving me that taste of celebrity, it gave me a glimpse of the past, memories of greatness, memories I did not even know I had forgotten: birthday parties as a child, catching that fly ball in the bottom of the ninth and being kissed by a first love. And while I recognized that those golden years were gone forever, I was still left with some hope. There was life after JDate after all. For starters, there was Lavalife, Matchmaker and, of course, Plentyoffish. ■

Government has finally righted a historical wrong

RABBI DANIEL FRIEDMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

First it was the shift in direction in Middle East policy. Then it was the long-overdue apology to First Nations. And now, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government has finally righted another historic wrong.

For many years, we were the only Allied nation in the world without a Holocaust monument in the capital. This sorry state of affairs was particularly peculiar, given the number of Holocaust survivors in the country – after the war, Canada took in the most survivors worldwide outside of Israel.

In 2009, Tim Uppal, MP for Sherwood Park in suburban Edmonton introduced Bill C-442, an Act to Establish a National Holocaust Monument, which passed unanimously in Parliament. Responsibility for this momentous task was assumed by Foreign Minister John Baird, who assembled a council from across Canada to oversee the project. Fran Sonshine and Ralph Lean were chosen from Toronto, Alvin Segal and Elliot Lifson from Montreal, and I represent western Canada. Our tireless executive director is Margi Oksner.

The National Holocaust Monument Development Council is charged with raising the funds and ensuring the project progresses smoothly at every stage of the process. Baird has committed $4 million toward the monument and we are aiming to raise $5 million from the citizens of Canada. So far, we have raised more than $4 million due to the exceptional generosity of Jews and non-Jews across our great nation.

The first stage of the process was to establish the purpose of the monument. A panel of experts and stakeholders was convened, and the consensus was that the monument must achieve three aims: serve as a memorial for the victims of the Nazis, acknowledge the incredible contribution of the survivors to the Canadian nation, and stand as an eternal symbol and reminder to future generations of Canada's commitment to combat all manner of intolerance and prejudice around the world.

Once the vision was determined, the design competition was initiated. We received 72 submissions from across the country, from which six finalists were chosen. A jury of experts consisting of architects, artists, historians and survivors was assembled, and the finalists were asked to prepare a model and a concept. While all of the submissions were outstanding, Landscape of Loss, Memory and Survival, presented by Gail Dexter-Lord's team was chosen by the jury and the ministers as the idea that best embodied the vision.

Over the last number of years, Baird has made a point of visiting Holocaust memorials wherever his travels take him. From the outset, he has been adamant that he wants Canada's monument to be the most memorable and meaningful in the world. We believe that Daniel Libeskind's design will be unparalleled in its power, message and impact upon visitors to the site.

When you enter the monument, your first feeling will be one of bewilderment and confusion. The towering concrete structure is designed to overwhelm. You will try to go to the left and to the right, each time in vain as you enter a chamber that has no further exit. Finally, you will find the staircase leading out of the monument. As you ascend the stairs, in the distance, you will see the Peace Tower of the Parliament of Canada. And you will breathe a sigh of relief.

The feelings of confusion and uncertainty were certainly experienced by survivors of the concentration and death camps of Nazi Germany. But it was a time when our nation of Canada too was doubt-stricken. We did not know how to respond. Today, that is no longer the case. We have a government that is dedicated to protecting the rights of all persecuted peoples around the world. And we have a nation of Canadians of all faiths who have opened up their hearts and wallets to support this important piece of our history.

We are almost there. We have a government who is unlike any government to have walked the face of the earth in its commitment to doing what's right. We have a prime piece of land, we have an internationally acclaimed design team and we have most of the funds in place. We invite you to become part of our national story at www.holocaustmonument.ca. ■

Rabbi Daniel Friedman is the chair of the National Holocaust Monument Development Council. He is rabbi of Beth Israel Synagogue, Edmonton and is pursuing a Ph.D. in international relations at the University of Alberta.

Wiesenthal conference draws 120

jshupac@thecjn.ca

"The only way to kill an idea is to expose it," Raheel Raza, Muslim Canadian journalist, media consultant, anti-racism activist and author of Their Jihad... Not my Jihad! declared starkly to an audience of about 120 at the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies' (FSWC) inaugural Leadership Policy Conference on Anti-Semitism.

Held on Sunday, June 8 at the University of Toronto's Hart House, the conference featured five panel discussions, each examining a different element of contemporary anti-Semitism.

Raheel spoke on the third panel, "Muslims against Anti-Semitism," alongside Tahir Gora, Pakistani writer, activist and founder of Canadian Thinkers' Forum, a think-tank specializing in Islamic radicalization and anti-Semitic incidents in the Muslim Diaspora, and Tarek Fatah, author of The Jew is Not My Enemy: Unveiling the Myths of Muslim Anti-Semitism, Toronto Sun columnist and founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress, a think tank that gives a voice to Muslims not affiliated with existing organizations.

The panel was moderated by Evan Green, incoming chair of the Lawyers 4Wiesenthal, a group of attorneys dedicated to promoting the FSWC's agenda. ■

Peres meets with Pope, Abbas at Vatican

MARISSA NEWMAN
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israeli President Shimon Peres issued a prayer for a lasting Israeli-Palestinian peace at the Vatican on Sunday, alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Pope Francis.

"These two nations – the Israelis and the Palestinians – suffer from the absence of peace. The tears of mothers for their sons is still heartbreaking," Peres said. "We must put an end to the pain, to the violence, the conflict. We all need peace. Peace between equals."

"Peace does not come easy. We must work with all our might until it is achieved, and achieved quickly, even if it calls for sacrifice and compromise. The Palestinians are our neighbours. We pray that soon we will live in mutual respect and good neighbourliness," he said.

"And even if peace seems distant, we must pursue it and bring it closer. And if we pursue peace with determination, with faith, we will reach it. And it will endure through all of us, as is written by Isaiah: 'They will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation will not take up sword against nation, nor will they train for war anymore.'"

Peres emphasized that peace was attainable. "It is in our hands – together, now, Israelis and Palestinians – to realize the great vision and [make it a] reality. We can bring peace to our children and grandchildren. This is our obligation, the sacred obligation of parents."

Peres also praised Pope Francis for his recent visit to Jerusalem, during which, he said, "You touched the hearts of people – regardless of their religion or nationality. You came as a builder of bridges of brotherhood and peace."

Abbas offered his prayer for peace shortly after Peres, saying emphatically that "reconciliation and peace, O Lord, are our goal."

"Here we are, O God, inclined to peace. Make firm our steps and crown our efforts and endeavours with success," he said.

Abbas praised the Pope's Middle East visit as "a sincere expression of your belief in peace and a truthful attempt to achieve peace between Palestinians and Israelis."

The PA leader also appealed to God to "save our blessed city Jerusalem," and prayed for "freedom in our sovereign and independent state," on behalf of "the people of Palestine – Muslims, Christians, and Samaritans – who are craving for a just peace, dignified living, and liberty."

"O Lord of Heaven and Earth, accept my prayer for the realization of truth, peace and justice in my country Palestine, the region, and the globe as a whole," he said.

Abbas and Peres were at the Vatican attending an unprecedented interfaith summit, having accepted the invitation of Pope Francis during his visit to Bethlehem and Jerusalem last month. ■

Israel will not unilaterally leave W. Bank, PMO says

MARISSA NEWMAN
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israel will not make unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, particularly if Hamas continues to hold sway, officials from the Prime Minister's Office said Sunday. The officials were responding to Finance Minister Yair Lapid's new peace plan that called for evacuation of parts of the area.

Officials also dismissed the finance minister's demand that the Israeli government produce maps outlining future borders, saying, "any map that is presented will become the point of departure for the Palestinians' demands.

"Anyone with political experience knows that you don't make concessions without [getting] anything in return, especially with a government partnered with a terror organization that wants to destroy Israel," officials said. The sources also referred to the 2005 disengagement from Gaza as proof of the futility of these measures.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

"We saw in Gaza the results of unilateral withdrawal," they said.

"The prime minister will continue to lead the State of Israel responsibly, while preserving the national interests of the citizens of Israel, starting with its security."

In a far-reaching speech at the Herzliya conference, an annual national security gathering, Lapid issued an appeal to return to negotiations with the Palestinians – despite the new Fatah-Hamas unity government – and outlined a new framework for peace that would draw borders and progress in three separate stages of Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank.

The finance minister also threatened to topple the government if right-wing calls to unilaterally annex areas of the West Bank are implemented.

Opposition leader Isaac Herzog appealed to Lapid to act on his threats and establish a coalition with the Labor party. "Go, get out of the government, it's not too late," he said, following Lapid's speech. "Join us, and I promise you I will bring the other partners."

Housing Minister Uri Ariel of the Jewish Home party responded derisively to the finance minister's threats, saying, "Israeli governments existed in the past without the Yesh Atid party, and will continue to exist without it." ■

Poland to expand survivors' pension

RAPHAEL AHREN
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Poland is making it easier for Holocaust survivors and other victims of Nazi or Soviet oppression to apply for monthly pensions, possibly enabling tens of thousands of Jews with Polish roots to start receiving payments as early as next summer, The Times of Israel has learned.

The government in Warsaw recently changed its laws to allow the Polish Office for War Veterans and Victims of Oppression to transfer a "monthly pecuniary allowance" of about 100 euros ($135 US) to eligible claimants who reside outside of Poland and don't have access to a bank account in the country. ■

Does Israel have a responsibility to intervene in Syria?

Gerald Steinberg

Should Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Israel's leadership send the IDF to intervene in Syria in order to reduce the violence or seek to end the slaughter of civilians resulting from the interminable civil war? In the face of paralysis in Washington, inaction from NATO and the European democracies, and the UN's failure, does Israel have a moral obligation to act unilaterally under the principle known as "responsibility to protect"?

From the perspective of political realism, which reserves the use of force for situations involving central national interests, the answer is clearly "no." Neither the survival of the Assad regime, allied with Iran and Hezbollah, nor a victory for radical Sunni Islamists leading the rebellion would place peaceful neighbours on Israel's border. Rationally, the best strategy for Israel is to continue to stay out while the two sides trade terror for terror and wear each other out.

However, from a moral perspective, the responsibility to protect civilians from chemical attacks and other forms of war crimes (real ones, as distinct from the propagandistic allegations targeting Israel) is particularly important for the Jewish state. We're very aware of the inactions of the world's democracies to intervene in Germany during the 1930s or to bomb the railroad tracks on the route to Auschwitz.

Israel is already providing extensive humanitarian assistance to Syrian victims of the civil war in their country, particularly through medical care for wounded civilians evacuated from the Golan Heights to the hospital in Safed. (At the same time, the moral corruption of the UN is taken to an even further level of absurdity as representatives of the Assad regime and obsessive Israel haters such as Richard Falk give speeches in the UN condemning Israel for "violations of international law.") So an Israeli strike to destroy Assad's remaining chemical arsenal and delivery systems would not be an entirely new departure.

The possibility that Israel might intervene on human rights grounds and the responsibility to protect has been raised by Amos Yadlin, a particularly thoughtful ex-general and currently head of the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv. In discussing justifications for Israeli military action in Syria, such as the transfer of advanced weapons to Hezbollah, he called for adding "to these red lines the murder of civilians at a level where we can no longer stand idly by. If Assad woke up one day to discover that all his helicopters dropping exploding barrels were gone, then the next day he had no navy, then the following day his security headquarters were attacked, he would realize that there's a price to pay for his actions." Yadlin prefers a U.S.-led intervention, including a no-fly zone and the creation of humanitarian aid corridor, but if necessary, Israel could act alone.

Indeed, in the past, the IDF has mounted extensive humanitarian relief operations in Haiti and rescue missions to populations struck by major earthquakes. But the situation in Syria is different – in this case, Israel would be acting militarily, although for humanitarian objectives, in a state that has waged war and supported the terror campaigns of the PLO, Hamas and Hezbollah. Such Israeli military action in Syria would also trigger a response from Assad's protectors in Iran.

A political realist would remind advocates for moral involvement in Syria, such as Yadlin, of the cliche that the "road to hell is paved with good intentions." In the Middle East and Europe, Israel would be reflexively portrayed and denounced as an occupation force, seeking to expand its borders again. The "responsibility to protect" notwithstanding, the European Union and its partners among non-governmental groups claiming human rights agendas would issue condemnations and threaten expanded boycotts.

The painful reality is that despite the lofty moral rhetoric, in the real world, no country, including any of the world's democracies, is willing to pay significant costs in the context of humanitarian intervention. As a result, the slaughter of civilians in Syria is likely to continue. ■

Referendum should be held on a two-state solution

ARIE RAIF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After nine months, the latest Israeli–Palestinian peace talks have ended with no positive results to speak of. Forget the blame game over who left the table at the moment of truth – as Israeli President Shimon Peres put it: "We left, too." All three parties involved Israel, the Palestinians and the United States – should be held responsible for the failure.

Perhaps the reason the peace process has once again stalled is that two very important and concerned parties are being ignored: the people of Israel, and the people of Palestine.

No one asked their opinion on what should be done or on how to move forward. More to the point, no one asked them to express their legitimate right to choose hope for a better future over an endless conflict.

For the Israelis, the way to move forward is to hold a referendum and precisely measure the will of the people. The question could be: " Do you want a two-state solution or a binational state?"

Jews, in Israel and around the world, are curious what Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's next step will be. Some hope the Israeli political class will adopt a more flexible policy in a real effort to resolve the conflict, but it's a dream. The current structure of Netanyahu's coalition government simply cannot resolve the Israeli–Palestinian conflict.

That's why a referendum is needed. Only when the government receives a mandate to negotiate the core issues can a solution to these 100 years of bloodshed be pursued.

The status quo cannot continue. It leads to a binational state, or the end of the Zionist dream. Former prime minister Ariel Sharon – the "father of the settlements" – put it well in May 2003 when he said, "controlling millions of Palestinians cannot go on forever.

"You want to remain in Jenin, Nablus, Ramallah and Bethlehem?" Sharon asked a meeting of stunned Likud leaders, Netanyahu among them. "The idea that it is possible to continue keeping millions of Palestinians under occupation – yes, it is occupation, you might not like the word, but what is happening is occupation. It's bad for Israel and bad for the Palestinians, and bad for the Israeli economy."

I would add that it is also bad for security and adds fuel to the fire of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement and growing anti-Semitism.

Zionism was never meant to be a colonial movement. It did not set out to seize control of a local population, or its natural resources. Already Israel is labelled by too many as a semi-colonial country, and the Jewish state is not succeeding in freeing itself from that moniker. If Israelis cannot muster the fortitude necessary to hand over the West Bank, we shall see the liquidation of Zionism, whether by the adoption of colonialism or binationalism.

The irony of history is again revealing itself: The settlements were supposed to have strengthened Zionism, to revive a movement many felt had lost its way In practice, however, the settlements created the price tag attacks.

There are so many obstacles to peace, and some of them have been placed along the road by the Israeli government. A referendum could help remove those obstacles, and firmly set the government on the path to peace.

A referendum will hold the Israeli government accountable to the voters. Let the people decide. ■

Toronto band hard to pin down musically

SHERI SHEFA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Members of the Toronto-based indie band The Maladies of Adam Stokes aren't interested in selling a signature sound or even letting themselves get too comfortable with a particular instrument.

But that hasn't gotten in the way of a growing fan base and a title as a spotlight artist at NXNE, Toronto's annual 10-day music, film, art and comedy festival running June 13-22.

The Jewish half of this six-member outfit, Kohji Nagata, Brett Harris and Josh Awerbuck, spoke to The CJN about their unpeggable sound, how they've evolved, and where they're going.

"It's hard right now... to pin down exactly what type of music it is that we play," Nagata said.

For anyone that's listened to their 2012 full-length album City of Trees, it's tempting to want to slot them into the folkmusic genre, but the fact that this five-year-old band is not afraid to venture out of its musical comfort zone means their fans don't always know what to expect.

"On our first record, a lot of the songs, they might have a similar sound to them, but they're all pretty different, so if someone didn't like one song, they might like the next one," Awerbuck said.

"With what we're doing now, it's interesting because it's a little difficult at times to get on the same page because we don't all listen to the same things, but that's also a good thing because we're challenging each other and bringing out new ideas and thoughts."

Perhaps what sets the Maladies apart is the fact that each of the band members has picked up new instruments, learning as they go.

"We knew that our friends were musically knowledgeable but they didn't necessarily have any practical ability with a given instrument," Nagata said.

"For example, I play trumpet and xylophone and a few other instruments that I had never played before in my life. Ted had never played the drums before, Brett was a guitar player but had never played bass before, so we kind of just put us all together and decided that we're going to make a band and figure out what we'll play afterwards," he said.

"It's not like we'd studied this in school, so we're kind of making it up as we go."

Harris said that when it comes to playing instruments they have yet to master, he feels it brings a unique element to their sound.

"I know for me, I'm constantly learning and exploring different styles of playing, and different techniques, so that can change the sound of a song or record or whatever," Harris said, suggesting that their next album, which they've started writing, might surprise their following.

"I think our next record is going to be a little more out there than our last record was. Maybe a little less folk-centric and a little more avant-garde," Nagata said.

Moonlighting as musicians, they all have day jobs – the lead singer, Mikey Hill, is a doctor, Nagata and Harris work for different companies making software for lawyers, and Awerbuck works in online advertising – but that hasn't held them back from selling out legendary Toronto venues including Horseshoe Tavern and Lee's Palace.

For those wondering what to expect from the Maladies going forward, Nagata said their goal is to keep the music as interesting as possible.

"I think we'll just keep trying new things, playing weird new instruments – I have a clarinet and flute at home that I barely know how to play, that I'll maybe one day add that in there. We'll just keep going crazy, keep things interesting and we'll never get bored as musicians and I don't think people will get bored of listening to it." ■

The Maladies of Adam Stokes plays the Tranzac Club on June 20 at 9 p.m. For more information visit www.nxne.com, and www.themaladiesofadamstokes.com.

AGO TO PRESENT RETROSPECTIVE ON COMIC ARTIST ART SPIEGELMAN

The Art Gallery of Ontario has announced it is presenting a major exhibition of works by acclaimed American comic artist Art Spiegelman, perhaps best known for Maus, a two-volume graphic novel that recounts his parents' life in Nazi-occupied Poland and later at Auschwitz.

Besides the Holocaust, Spiegelman's works have been based upon politics, cubism and hard-boiled detective fiction. The exhibition will feature some 300 pieces including early comics, trading cards, magazine covers and original manuscripts of Maus, rarely seen due to their fragility.

It will also feature Spiegelman's original cover art for The New Yorker, including a print of the black-on-black 9/11 issue. "Art Spiegelman's CO-MIX: A Retrospective" opens December 20 and runs to March 14, 2015.

TD Toronto Jazz Festival: The 2014 Festival (www.torontojazz.com) runs June 19 to 28 at venues around the city and features many wonderful performers including these artists of special interest to the Jewish community:

• Amanda Martinez, a Toronto-based singer-songwriter who blends her Mexican-South African-Jewish roots with flamenco soul. She performs with June Garber & Friends, featuring Russ Little. Old Mill Home Smith Bar, June 21, 7:30 p.m.

• Ori Dagan, a Toronto-raised Israeli-born vocalist who reimagines material by Elton John, Madonna, Elvis Presley, Frank Sinatra and Lady Gaga, along with standards and selections in his native Hebrew. Various locations on June 20, 26, 27 & 28.

• Trumpeter David Buchbinder and Ensemble perform at Odessa Havana, Shops at Don Mills, on June 22.

• Toronto guitarist Lorne Lofsky performs three shows during the festival, June 20, 21, and 22.

• Beka Gochiashvili, an 18-year-old pianist and composer from Tbilisi, Georgia, joins the Stanley Clarke Band on June 28, 8 p.m. at Nathan Phillips Square. He has been described as an "old soul in a very young body" and is regarded as a piano virtuoso.

New in Print

• Volume IV of Living Legacies: A Collection of Writing by Contemporary Canadian Jewish Women, was recently published by PK Press. The editor is Liz Pearl. Visit www.facebook.com/PKPress for details.

• A newly revised edition has appeared of Brantford author Howard Rotberg's non-fiction book Tolerism: The Ideology Revealed. The book attempts to answer the question, "How did we get into the mess that so many people think that tolerance is a more important value than justice?" A reviewer for The Times of Israel recently found the book "well researched and surprisingly easy to read." www.mantuabooks.com

Out of Town

• A new exhibit at the Museum of Jewish Heritage in Manhattan focuses on the rich Jewish history of Oswiecim, Poland, the town the Germans called Auschwitz, through photographs and artifacts from the 16th century through the postwar period. Selections from "A Town Known As Auschwitz: The Life and Death of a Jewish Community" are also on view online, at www.jmjhnyc.org.

• The Israel Museum of Jerusalem recently acquired Die Medizin, an oil study by Gustav Klimt (1862-1918) for a monumental painting that once adorned the ceiling of the University of Vienna's Great Hall. Commissioned by Austria's Ministry of Culture and Education in 1894, Die Medizin was one of three allegorical panels representing the themes of enlightenment. All three works were later destroyed by retreating German SS forces in May 1945. Blending elements of neo-Baroque and Secessionist aesthetics, the work captures the emergence of Klimt's iconic style and unconventional treatment of subject matter and themes. ■

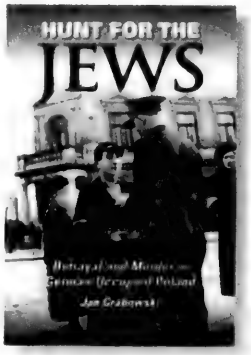
A historian's pursuit of new views of Holocaust

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Hunt for the Jews: Betrayal and Murder in German-Occupied Poland.
Jan Grabowski.

Indiana University Press

For many, Holocaust reception is experienced through popular culture, museum shows, and community events memorializing the Holocaust, which often include the testimony of survivors. This is a notable shift from early stages of Holocaust reception, in the 1960s and after, when historians such as Raul Hilberg, Michael Marrus, along with major European figures, led the discussion of how we should understand the events of the war.

Today, dedicated readers of detailed historiographical studies are, for the most part, found in academic circles, and to surmise the state of the art of Holocaust historiography one might enroll in a university course.

Sustained interest in the Holocaust reveals that over time the venues by which we study it, the audiences who consume this information, and the focus of their interest, all shift. Marshall McLuhan's pithy phrase the medium is the message points to the fact that what we read and look at with regard to the war affects what we know.

A new kind of historical study in English has been made available through scholars' access to eastern European archives that were untouchable during the Soviet period. Ottawa-based historian Jan Grabowski is one of a new breed of English-language researchers who can work with Polish, German or Russian documents, and through their tenacity and care continue to transform our understanding of the disaster that befell Polish Jews upon the German invasion of their country.

Grabowski's new volume bears the almost unbearable title, Hunt for the Jews: Betrayal and Murder in German-Occupied Poland. It might be characterized as a "microhistory," because of its focus on a particular population in one largely rural area of Poland called Dabrowa Tarnowska County, northeast of Krakow. Grabowski has used this approach before, notably in his studies of the records left by the Gestapo outpost at Ciechanow, north of Warsaw. The Jewish population of Dabrowa Tarnowska was not large; a 1931 census counted 4,807 out of a total population of 66,678. The area included only two settlements one could call towns, while the rest of the population lived in villages or on farming estates. (A large village had 1,000 inhabitants; while a small one might have 500 or less.)

In Hunt for the Jews, remarkable use is made of testimonies made after the war by Jewish survivors to refugee organizations, as well as in depositions for the trials of Germans and Poles who conspired with the Nazis. These documents are certainly unknown and inaccessible to the layman, as well as to the average maker of literature, film or museum exhibits in the west. In this, Grabowski's historical art lays bare a set of events, a kind of Holocaust narrative, that most readers will not have encountered.

Testimonies by survivors were made immediately after the war at local offices of the Central Committee of Polish Jews. These were later transferred to the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, a remarkable institution that today houses the wartime archive of Emmanuel Ringelblum and operates as a key site of Jewish research in Poland. From these, and other sources, he highlights 24 accounts "of Jews who survived the war hidden in Dabrowa Tarnowska and in nearby villages."

Though Grabowski's materials offer a full depiction of events that followed the German occupation of the villages of Dabrowa Tarnowska, his focus is in fact another set of experiences: that is, the effort by many thousands of Jews to hide in the countryside following major deportations.

Hunt for the Jews examines the methods by which they managed this, and the involvement of Poles, under the tutelage of Germans, in hunting these Jews. This stage of the war in Poland had a German moniker – the Judenjagd – referring to the "organized searches for Jews" who attempted to hide "on the Aryan side." Although Grabowski paints a broader picture of the success of such efforts in the Polish countryside, his materials allow him to trace the "destinies of 337 Jews who, after the liquidation of the ghettos, tried to survive in Dabrowa Tarnowska county. Of this number, 51 succeeded, and survived in hiding until the liberation . . . ."

Grabowski provides a detailed picture of the network set in place by the Germans, radiating from local Gestapo outposts, to the contingents of local or newly arrived Volksdeutsche and agreeable Poles, who constituted obedient gendarmeries. These groups tasked village leaders and the infamous Polish "blue police" to capture and hand over discovered Jews.

Early in his study Grabowski cites Ringelblum, who wrote in his diary in the Warsaw Ghetto about related events: "The length of time that it was possible to go on hiding a Jew depended on two things - the German terror and the surrounding atmosphere. Where the environment had been infected with anti-Semitism before the war, hiding Jews presented great difficulties, and denunciations by anti-Semitic neighbours were more to be feared there than the German terror."

This account provides an entry into the period in the second half of the war when the structure of Polish-Jewish society was entirely destroyed by the Germans, and new forms of interaction became the norm. Grabowski examines in detail the economy of "paid help" from Poles in relation to what he calls "altruistic help."

Grabowski's resources provide astonishingly detailed portraits of the ongoing Judenjagd, of the infrastructure of Polish helpers for this German project, and of the fate of those caught in forest or village hiding places. As counter-texts to certain tendencies in popular culture – whether to style Holocaust exhibits, texts and films toward a moral lesson or a particular audience - these documents provide chilling, unmediated narratives. They make for very difficult reading but are true and existentially shocking in a way that an artful narrative can rarely be. They are, as Grabowski must have felt in including them in his book, necessary reading.

The events examined in Hunt for the Jews have returned to Polish popular discussions, in part because of the recent film Aftermath, which is a fictionalized treatment of the 1941 pogrom at Jedwabne. There, Germans supported Polish murderers in their attack on their Jewish neighbours. A film styled as a counter-narrative to this appeared on Polish TV, under the title Historia Kowalskich, focusing on Poles executed for helping Jewish families. These contemporary Polish debates are made comprehensible in the most immediate and painful way by Grabowski's Hunt for the Jews. ■

Doc examines links between Rastafarianism and Judaism

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Filmmaker Monica Haim (centre, in yellow) explores the religious and musical connections between Jewish and Rastafarian cultures in the documentary Awake Zion.

Their way of life is rooted in the psalms of David and the words of the Old Testament. One of their symbols of hope is the Star of David. Their music comes from a source of pain stemming from years of slavery, yet evokes a message of peace and community, often culminating in a return to Zion.

However, these spiritual people are Rastafarian, not Jewish. In the documentary Awake Zion, screening on June 15 at the Upfront Studio Theatre in Toronto, American filmmaker Monica Haim explores the similarities between Judaism and the Rastafarian movement. These two spiritual followings seem different but actually have much in common.

Haim grew up in a devout Jewish household in Miami and had a Yeshiva-style education. As a teen, she says she was drawn to music commonly associated with African and African-American culture, including blues, funk and hip-hop. The ancient, traditional feel of many reggae songs, though, with lyrics about going to the "land where the milk and honey flow," stuck out for Haim.

"Inevitably, I ran into symbols and stories and pieces of culture that were kind of familiar to me," Haim says. "I was curious about the rhetoric of reggae and Rastafarian culture. Why was it really hitting a nerve that was not just cool but oddly familiar?"

> Rastafarians see themselves as the 'lost tribe'

Haim first made Awake Zion in 2005, (since updated in 2013) as a Master's student at New York University, where she focused her studies on music history. Fascinated by how Rasta culture shared much in common with Judaism, she researched as much reggae music as she could, combing through lyrics and analyzing cover art to find Biblical allusions.

In the film, Haim visits the Crown Heights neighbourhood in Brooklyn, where there were rifts between the Caribbean and Jewish communities. She explains that music contains a healing power to bring these groups together.

"Reggae music makes you feel positive, optimistic, hopeful," Haim says. "It puts you in the position of belief in the world."

Crown Heights is not the only place where a hybrid of Jewish and Rasta music comes together, most notably with Grammy-nominated reggae fusion artist Matisyahu. Israel also has a thriving reggae scene that Haim explores in Awake Zion, and there is currently a spiritual Jewish revival in Jamaica.

In one of the film's most fascinating scenes, Haim visits a synagogue in Kingston, Jamaica with two of the town's most revered Rasta leaders. After their visit, one of them tells the filmmaker he had no idea that these aspects he presumed were limited to Rasta culture could be found anywhere else.

"They were baffled because they were not expecting to see 'their' symbols [at the synagogue]" she says. "We're closer than we actually think."

Meanwhile, both followers of Judaism and Rastafarianism commit to their faith by allowing their hair to grow, through payot and dreadlocks. Some Rastafarians even call themselves "the true Israelites" and "the lost tribe," as their beliefs are deeply rooted in the tenets of the Old Testament.

Jews and Rastas also refer to a return to Zion, whether that is a physical place (Israel) or a spiritual place of perfection and nirvana.

"This film is a spark," says Michael Brooke, the founder of Longboarding for Peace, which is co-presenting Awake Zion on June 15. "It is a way to get a conversation to two very different groups who need to start talking and working with each other.

"There are so many Jews who love reggae who have no clue how culturally significant Judaism is within Rastafarianism," he adds.

Brooke says he wants to use the film as a way to start a dialogue. The presentation will be for an intimate audience of around 30 people, Meanwhile, Toronto Rastafest organizer Masani Montague says she wants to present the film for hundreds at Rastafest on Aug. 23.

The hope is to start a movement of spiritual awareness and awakening through word-of-mouth screenings.

"It's about taking two people who seem to be on the opposite ends of the spiritual spectrum and finding commonality between them," Haim says. "Even though we all need to have our own identity... it's equally important to find that which connects us to other cultures."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Israeli cuisine with a French twist

Gayla Sarner says her love affair with cooking dates back to her childhood.

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Israeli food maven Galya Sarner has added a new twist to fusion cuisine.

We tend to think of fusion food as western-style fare melded with Asian or Mexican cuisine. But Sarner describes her fusion dishes as "Israeli-style food with a French twist."

Her cooking reflects the cuisine of the countries where she has lived – France and Israel. And since she moved to Canada nine years ago, many of her recipes contain maple syrup, an iconic Canadian ingredient.

Sarner, director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israeli-Canadian project, and the originator of A Taste of Israel, a culinary program based at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, recently gave a cooking demonstration to some 40 people at Beth Sholom Synagogue, hosted and organized by the shul's sisterhood.

Sarner said her "love affair with cooking" dates back to her childhood. She grew up in Jerusalem and she loved to shop with her mother in Mahane Yehuda, the bustling outdoor market. She also helped her mother prepare traditional Iraqi dishes for Shabbat.

When she and her husband, Toronto native Robert Sarner (a former columnist for The CJN), moved from Israel to Paris, she took up French cooking. "I learned so much from the French and their famous passion for food."

Sarner said many of the Iraqi dishes she had grown up with were made with a lot of oil. But after her five-year stint in Paris, she learned to cook with less oil and more fresh produce.

For instance, her mother would often fry eggplant, she recalled. "I would wake up to the smell of eggplant.

"Eggplant is like a sponge. When you fry it, it absorbs a lot oil, and when you eat it, you feel like you've put on three kilos. I try to make eggplant in a different way."

One of the recipes she demonstrated was baked eggplant slices seasoned with ingredients including fresh basil and sage, paprika, balsamic vinegar and maple syrup.

Sarner also prepared a labane (yogurt cheese) dish with roasted maple pears, fig balls stuffed with a mixture of sun-dried tomatoes and feta cheese, Iraqi-French-style pickled lemons, an Israeli-style quinoa salad, and roasted maple pecans.

She encourages people to be creative in the kitchen. "Don't be afraid to make mistakes," she said. "When it comes to the kitchen, there are no mistakes." ■

Galya's Baked Eggplant

- ❑ 1 cup fresh organic arugula
- ❑ 2 medium eggplants

Spice Mixture:

- ❑ 4 tbsp. fresh basil, finely chopped
- ❑ 3 tbsp. dried oregano
- ❑ 3 tbsp. chopped onions
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. black pepper
- ❑ 1 tsp. sweet paprika
- ❑ 5 tbsp. olive oil

Dressing

- ❑ 1/2 cup olive oil
- ❑ 1/4 cup white wine vinegar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. maple syrup
- ❑ 1 clove garlic, finely chopped
- ❑ 2 tbsp. fresh basil, finely chopped
- ❑ 1 tsp. Dijon mustard

Preheat oven to 350. Prepare spice mixture by combining basil, oregano, onions, paprika and olive oil in a bowl. Mix well and set mixture aside. Slice eggplant in discs about 1/2 in. thick, and place slices on a lightly greased flat baking tray.

Bake eggplant for about 10 minutes. When the colour turns gold, turn the eggplant slices over. Bake another 7 minutes. Take tray out of the oven and carefully spread 1 tbsp. of the spice mixture in the centre of each eggplant slice. Bake for an additional 5 to 7 minutes. Remove the tray of eggplant slices and let cool to room temperature.

For dressing, combine oil, wine and balsamic vinegars, syrup, garlic, basil, mustard or marinated sage. Mix well and refrigerate.

About an hour before serving, place arugula on a serving platter and arrange eggplant slices on the bed of arugula. Pour sauce evenly over the eggplant and arugula. Makes 6 servings.

THE REAL STORY

From the pages of Pope Francis's travel journal:

David Levine

SUNDAY: We depart tomorrow for the Holy Land. My soul longs to see the land of the Bible, to speak with both sides of an ancient conflict, and to work for peace. I thank the Lord for this historic opportunity, and I dedicate myself steadfastly to the task.

I confess that my body yearns for the luxuries of first class , but I am a willing servant, and would never complain about the leg-room in coach – or about having to share a row with Cardinal Ricardo, whose breath is like the breath of a diseased cow chewing on a diaper. We, like John Belushi before us, are on a mission from God.

MONDAY: We arrived, after visiting Amman, the West Bank and Jerusalem in a single day. All through the afternoon, the voice of Carnac rang in my ear: "Name three places that don't love Popes." (Does anyone remember Carnac? Ask Brother Alexander later.)

I feel an instant kinship with this ancient land: the stone buildings, the smell of blooming flowers in the evening. A few hiccups slowed the day's progress – the Lord saw fit to guide our luggage to the carousel last, the rental car was more expensive than Priceline implied, and calling Palestine a state upset some of the locals. I guess nobody's infallible, right? (jk)

P.S. Don't call anyone a 'maniac'. It's not the same thing here.

TUESDAY: My pilgrimage continues to be a testament to the beauties of God's creation. I am resolute in my quest to open a dialogue for peace, no matter the setbacks. This afternoon some passionate soul called me a fascist and threw a Slurpee in my face. (Brother Anthony pointed out that Glee only got to Israel this year.)

... Visited the Al Aqsa Mosque and the Wailing Wall. Our guide hinted that the whole world was waiting for the return of the missing Ark of the Covenant to the Temple, and the whole tour group stared at me. I said nothing; tolerance is great, but there's still only one true faith, amiright? Anyway. I'd never ask them to give up their furniture, so I don't see where they get the right.

...My thoughts turn to the topography of God's holiest land, and to the immodest irritation my inner thighs are suffering. Why has the Lord seen fit to afflict me so? Perhaps as a reminder of the suffering that occurs here - or perhaps because it's 130 degrees out and I'm wearing a cassock. Still, I can't help but wonder: would the Bible tell a happier story if the whole thing happened in Belgium, or something?

WEDNESDAY: Today marks the last day of our pilgrimage. I visited the refugee camp at Dheisheh, a memorial for victims of terror, a cemetery, and Yad Vashem. If the word 'vacation' has an antonym, I seem to have found it. (P.S. Yad Vashem has a Pope Pius XII exhibit, so....that was awkward.)

...I was fairly distressed by the time I left the bus, near the separation wall. Truth be told, all I wanted was a selfie with that Banksy painting, but everyone assumed I was praying, and the media pounced. I can't wait for Kimye's wedding photos to wipe this story from the news.

...Brother Andrew asked which gifts we should bring back and gave me a choice between vials of "holy dirt" and cans of "holy air". I'm all for transubstantiation, but I told Andrew that dirt is dirt, and people like chocolate from anywhere.

...On the plane home. Invited Abbas and Peres over for tea and prayer next month, which annoyed everyone again. Brother Philip had too much "take-off wine" and impertinently inquired after the contents of the note I left in the Wall. I kept my silence. Perhaps I should have prayed once more for peace or understanding – but, to be honest, the trip inspired only eight words in my prayer, words which will help me sleep peacefully until we land: "Thank you for giving me my own country." ■

Shlach | Numbers 13:1 - 15:41

Rabbi Aaron Katchen says we have the power to own up to our mistakes and fix them
Rabbi Michal Shekel writes God is our spiritual coach, despite our shortcomings
Rabbi Howard Morrison remembers his father's unique 'tour' of Judaism

Aaron Katchen

"And the Lord said, 'I have forgiven [them] in accordance to your words.'" (Numbers 14:20)

"But if an individual sins inadvertently, he shall offer up a she-goat in its first year as a sin offering. And the kohen shall atone for the erring soul which sinned inadvertently before the Lord, so as to atone on his behalf, and it shall be forgiven him." (Numbers 15:27-28)

Horayot (decisions) is a tractate of the Talmud that probes how we understand authority and what happens when our systems break down. Each of the three chapters deal with what happens when the court system errs, when the king errs, and when the High Priest errs.

The foundational text for these chapters is found in our parshah, in the verses of chapter 15. The guiding words appear to be "inadvertent error/sin" and "forgiveness." They're repeated regularly to illuminate how to correct errors when they occur.

It's common in our society to respond to a leader's failure or an institution's mistake by removing the individual or closing the institution. The Torah, conversely, takes the approach of understanding the imperfect nature of the human condition. There are intentional sins and unintentional sins. Both can be perpetrated by an individual or an institution.

When a sin is intentional, there are consequences from both human justice and divine justice. Our section is more concerned with inadvertent sins. This is where the beauty of the process appears. Humans and human institutions have agency. We have the power to act and to change. We have the ability when confronted with our errors to ignore them, to try to justify why they weren't a mistake or to own up to them and rectify the situation. When I have the courage to confront my mistakes and change them, God answers me with "I have forgiven in accordance to your words." ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen is associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Michal Shekel

Reading the report of the scouts in Shlach and how we looked like grasshoppers to ourselves (Numbers 13:32), I needed a shot of self-esteem. An Internet search turned up more than 52 million pieces of advice. Clearly, I'm not alone in my quest. Fortunately, the best answer was old school, a two-parter found within this week's parshah.

"When you enter the land… as the first yield of your baking, you shall set aside a loaf [challah] as a gift… You shall make a gift to the Lord from the first yield of your baking, throughout the ages." (Numbers 15:18, 20, 21) For 40 years, God fed us manna. Upon entering the land of Israel, we were to reciprocate by setting aside a portion of our bread for God. This challah is our hand-made, homemade gift deemed precious by God. Think of the crafts kids bring home from school – the pride associated with making and giving, the delight of receiving and the connections reinforcing human self-worth.

A unique perspective on challah, citing our parshah, is found in midrash Genesis Rabbah. During creation, God removed challah: earth and water formed the dough that was used to make the human being. Separated from the rest of creation, humanity was thereby elevated – a powerful message about our value.

This is reinforced at the end of the parshah with the commandment regarding tzitzit. Related to an ancient Akkadian word for "ornament," tzitzit were a decorative element found on clothing worn by nobles. Add to this the blue thread of the tzitzit, a "royal" colour, and you have an ongoing reminder of how God views us.

We may think we are grasshoppers, but despite our shortcomings and disobedience, God sees our potential. Who needs Oprah when the Holy One of Blessing is your spiritual coach? ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

A week from this coming Shabbat, I'll commemorate the 15th yahrzeit, of my father, Ruben Morrison, who died June 7, 1999. My father spent most of his childhood in an impoverished foster home in the Bronx, N.Y. He grew up with minimal Jewish education, but possessed a genuine love for Jewish tradition and for Israel.

That love inspired this man to one day raise four children with day school educations, regular attendance and involvement in our local shul, and a family trip to Israel in our teenage years.

The spiritual journey of my father, a virtual tourist educationally in his own tradition, comes to mind as I reflect on Parshat Shlach. The beginning and end are united by the Hebrew word "latur," often translated as "to scout" or "to spy." At the outset, representatives of the 12 tribes are sent to investigate the Land of Israel. I prefer to understand the word "latur" as it sounds in English, meaning to "tour" the land.

In the beginning, the scouts see themselves mostly as tourists in the Promised Land. As a result, 10 of the 12 report back negatively, while only two, Joshua and Caleb, report back positively.

At the end of Shlach, we read what seems to be an unrelated text, the passage that's now the third paragraph of the Shema. In the commandment to wear tzitzit, the Torah states that you shall look upon the fringe "v'lo taturu," and not be led astray. I understand this to mean that one who wears tzitzit and thereby immerses oneself in mitzvot won't be led astray, meaning that one won't "be a tourist" in one's tradition. My father's journey and the values he gave to his children continue through me to my own children. I wish us all safety, health and fun as we explore the world as tourists this summer. But may it never be said we were tourists in our own Judaism. ■

Tel Aviv University to receive eye-related research program

Retired Toronto accountant donates $110,000

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dr. Allan Slomovic will be setting up a major eye-related research program at Tel Aviv University due to a donation of $110,000 from retired chartered accountant, Meyer Zeifman.

Slomovic, a world renowned researcher, is the research director of the corneal/external disease service at Toronto Western Hospital, University Health Network. He is also president of the Canadian Ophthalmological Society and immediate past chairman of the Canadian Cornea Society.

He is an associate professor of ophthalmology at the University of Toronto. Among his many awards, Aish Toronto recently honoured him at a Heritage of Healing gala dinner.

Slomovic developed the hospital's new cornea replacement program that is part of his plan to make the University Health Network the country's go-to ocular regenerative program.

"International co-operation is a priority for Tel Aviv University," says Stephen Adler, executive director of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

"A particular emphasis is placed on bringing basic research discoveries to applied and clinical stages. The Zeifman donation allows the Tel Aviv University to continue building on its already strong relationship with University of Toronto."

The Meyer Zeifman Cornea and Stem Cell Research Project will commence in Israel in the 2014-2015 academic year.

"Ocular stem cell disease is a serious ocular condition that often results in blindness and severe pain, usually affecting younger individuals in the prime of their lives," says Slomovic.

"It can have devastating effects on the patient and also on the lives of their loved ones. Unfortunately, traditional ophthalmic treatments, such as corneal transplantation, are not successful in this group of patients.

"In many circumstances ocular stem cell transplantation offers them the only hope of getting their lives back."

He noted that at both Tel Aviv University and the University of Toronto are at the forefront of new and innovative corneal research treatment.

> This important and impactful donation made by Meyer Zeifman, supporting stem cell research at both universities, will allow for collaboration and the potential for bringing research from the laboratory to the bedside, offering hope for patients suffering with ocular stem cell disease.

"This important and impactful donation made by Meyer Zeifman, supporting stem cell research at both universities, will allow for collaboration and the potential for bringing research from the laboratory to the bedside, offering hope for patients suffering with ocular stem cell disease."

TAU has more than 40 research groups from various aspects of regenerative medicine and 30 groups focusing on diverse areas of cell and developmental biology that have a direct bearing on regenerative medicine.

Zeifman told The CJN that he suffered for many years with pain and swelling in his eyes. While on a trip to Israel, after several painful episodes with his eyes, an Israeli ophthalmologist in Jerusalem diagnosed his problem.

"For many years I wanted to thank Israel for saving my sight and I searched for a project," says Zeifman.

"It was my friend, Beverley Burdeyney, a community volunteer and fundraiser who introduced me to Dr. Slomovic and the shidduch was made for the project in Israel."

Burdeyney said that Zeifman's donation "will kickstart awareness of both young and old who suffer from eye related diseases and issues."

She added that a campaign has been created to raise additional money for a $250,000 eye research project at the university. ■

Gina Waldman: Making the case for Jewish refugees

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Gina Waldman was born in Tripoli, Libya with the family name, Bublil. Her family fled the country in 1967 as anti-Semitic mobs attacked Jews during the Six Day War. A human rights advocate, she found JIMENA – Jews Indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa – following the 9/11 attacks in the United States. In May 2013, she testified before a House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development that recommended the government recognize the fate of Jewish refugees from Arab countries, a position adopted by Parliament in March. She was in Toronto recently for a series of lectures, including one delivered at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Tell me about JIMENA. Who does it represent and what is its purpose?

JIMENA represents Jews from all Arab countries where there was a Jewish presence. JIMENA preserves the culture and traditions of these Jewish minorities, and our biggest mission is to educate the public about our story, the story of exile, which has not been adequately addressed.

We do that through several methods. The most successful is our 35-member speakers bureau. These are all eyewitnesses from different Arab countries who are sent to university campuses and synagogues to tell their stories.

We find that by telling the stories, people put two and two together and realize the Middle East has two groups of refugees, the Palestinians and the Jews.

Some people might say it wasn't the Palestinians who expelled the Jews. But the Palestinians enlisted the help of the Arab League. They turned around and declared a different kind of war toward their Jewish populations by arresting them, or harassing them, or torturing them, or by hanging them in public squares.

Gina Waldman

They made our lives impossible and finally expulsion was what happened in many countries.

How well known among Arabs is the story of Mizrahi [eastern] Jews?

Arabs themselves don't know their own history. Jews had lived and were indigenous to their region for over 2,000 years. The new generation is told by their parents that yes, Jews lived here, but they were Zionists and they chose to go to Israel and they left.

JIMENA has 10 websites, and we translated them all into Arabic. We used to get 50,000 hits a month. Since they were translated into Arabic, we get 150,000 hits a month. And a lot of that is coming from Middle Eastern countries. That tells us that these people really want to know what happened to their Jews.

What's your own story?

I was born and raised in Tripoli in 1948, when there were some 36,000 Jews between Tripoli and Benghazi.

We were not considered citizens, we had no human rights, we were not allowed to have passports, we were not allowed to work for the government, we were basically what they called dhimmi [second-class citizens].

When I was 14, I went to study in Switzerland. I returned in 1967 to Tripoli for the summer when the war broke out between Israel and the Arab countries.

I was working for a British firm, and I had to go into hiding in the garage of my employer, who was a British Christian. After a month, I was able to reunite with my family. In the meantime, riots were taking place all over Tripoli and Benghazi. The people, the mob were running up and down the streets, identifying Jewish buildings with a white X and putting gasoline all around it and they would burn it.

If they were able to get into a Jewish home, they'd drag the Jews out and God knows, kill them. Two families were murdered in this period. My father's warehouse was burned to the ground. Many properties owned by Jews were burned. Eventually the king said for your own protection, you better leave.

How did you get out?

We had to leave with only $20 equivalent and one suitcase. We boarded this bus taking us to the airport and in the middle of the road, the bus pulls over. I saw the conductor also leave. He said, there's something mechanically wrong with the bus. And then he disappeared.

I decided something was definitely wrong. I ran to a gas station where the conductor was making a phone call in this little hut in the desert. And he said everything was OK. I struggled with him for the phone. I called my British employer and said, come quickly we're in danger.

I hang up, and I see the driver outside. The driver has a packet of matches in his hand, and there's a huge pool of gasoline under the bus. I look up and here's my brother who's 13, my mother is crying, my grandfather is praying, seven of us altogether. And I realized really the life of all my family is hanging on that box of matches.

That's when I really lost my cool, and I started following this man's hand with the matches. After a few minutes, this British engineer, Brian, and another engineer, John, came with two jeeps. They said, "Oh my God, this is ready to explode. Let's get everybody out." We left half of our luggage on the bus, we grabbed the people from the bus and off we went to the airport.

I started JIMENA after 9/11 because I wanted people to know that the culture of hatred that made me into a refugee, that made 850,000 Jews refugees, the intolerance in Arab countries, that was what 9/11 was all about. The people who perpetrated it, came from the same culture of hatred against America as against us.

How significant are the moves by the Canadian Parliament and the U.S. Congress to recognize the fate of Jewish refugees?

Very significant. Canada has always had a role in human rights. In this case, Canada could be an example to lead other countries to do the same thing.

Do you expect European parliaments will get on board with this?

We very much hope so and we feel that having Canada lead this would be really key.

Have any Arab governments apologized?

Some Arab countries have outright denied any wrongdoing. Some say, "You can come back." The fact is, there is more anti-Semitism today in Arab countries... than when there were 850,000 Jews living among the Arabs. ■

Is history bunk?

Backstory

MICHAEL BROWN

Once I was in Toronto's Negev Bookstore, of blessed memory, inquiring about a new book, Re-inventing the Jewish Past by my landsman, Prof. David Myers of UCLA. Barely had I uttered the title, when the man behind me harrumphed: "We have a past. No need to re-invent it." I understood where my irate interlocutor was coming from. I could have recommended Zachor, the masterly work of my former graduate school classmate, the late Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi, which delineates the difference between memory and history. Or I could have suggested he play a game of "broken telephone." I did neither.

As Jews, we have both memory and history. And while memory purports to be historical, sometimes it is, and sometimes it isn't. Many things in our past happened so long ago that the kinds of documentation historians require for verification cannot be found. And much of the time, historical accuracy really doesn't matter. Memory, accurate or not, usually selective, can be powerful and meaningful.

But that is not to buy into the "History is bunk!" dictum of Henry Ford. Ford, a nasty anti-Semite, as is well documented, was a pioneering industrialist and an American. As both, he valued the future and had little patience for the "lessons" of history. But if history is not bunk, how can it be invented or re-invented?

If we want to know how we got where we are, we do need to know history. History teaches no specific general lessons, because every historical situation is unique. Those who fail to understand that make bad decisions. Generals, it is said, always prepare for the last war, not the next. But actions have consequences, and we need to understand what happened in order to assess the possibilities the future holds. And here is where the multi-facetedness of history counts.

The re-invention Myers talks about in his book is not fabrication but the new emphases of scholars of the nascent Hebrew University, most especially, their interest in the Zionist, national aspects of Jewish history, and their de-emphasis of "books and tears," as my teacher, the late Prof. Salo Baron, perhaps the greatest of modern historians of the Jews, described the work of earlier historians. They sought, in other words, a past usable for the Zionist enterprise.

Such re-invention, or reconsideration of the past, is not new to Jews. How do we tell the story of Purim? Is it a Zionist tale of near annihilation in the Diaspora or a story of the value of assimilation (Esther as saviour)? And Pesach? Is its liberation story meant to fortify our determination to assert ourselves, never again to be slaves, or to remind us to be compassionate to the disadvantaged?

We have the same kinds of questions regarding the modern era. Is Polish Jewish history that of poverty and anti-Semitism, or of the great yeshivot, Chassidism and Mussar, and flourishing secular institutions (Yiddish and Hebrew literature, vibrant Zionism, thriving political parties)?

And Germany? Is its Jewish story the Holocaust, or the birth of modern Judaism (Reform, Conservative, and modern Orthodox – Buber, Rosenzweig, Baeck and Samson Raphael Hirsch), the temporary sanctuary of Hebrew writers (Bialik, Agnon, Tchernihovsky), and the first headquarters of the World Zionist Organization and the birthplace of its second and third presidents?

And Canada, is it the country of "None Is Too Many" or of multiculturalism, diversity and support for Israel?

There is, of course, no either/or. The historical past is complex and contradictory. Historians will emphasize now one aspect of the past and now another. They will continue to re-invent, to search for a usable past. The main goal of re-invention today is truth and reconciliation. They go together. As Jews, we have often re-thought our complex and contradictory history. We shall undoubtedly have to do so in the future, even re-inventing the past re-invented not so long ago by those early Hebrew University sages. ■

Michael Brown, is professor emeritus and senior scholar of humanities, history, and Hebrew, York University.

A fabulous display in Tel Aviv, and a political reversal

TA City Hall lights up for Pride

A massive, illuminated gay pride flag with 480 LED light bulbs – the world's largest rainbow flag – adorned Tel Aviv City Hall in Rabin Square in celebration of the city's 21st annual Gay Pride Week last week. Some 130,000 Israelis and travellers came to Tel Aviv for the event, which culminated in the annual Pride Parade on June 13. Tel Aviv is consistently listed among the world's "Best Gay Cities" by GayCities and ranked the No. 2 "Best Gay Honeymoon Destination" in the world by Business Insider in 2013.

Red card for Nike World Cup ad?

Echoing widespread sentiment on social media, the Anti-Defamation League last week rejected suggestions by an Israeli MK and the World Zionist Federation that a World Cup video ad for Nike had an underlying anti-Semitic message. After the animated video was released last Monday and went viral on YouTube, the World Zionist Federation and Yisrael Beytenu MK Shimon Ohayon charged that its evil robot clones who face off against human soccer stars are sporting a ball emblem on their jerseys that they say strongly resembles the Star of David. Nike called the resemblance "entirely coincidental and unintentional" and the ADL apparently agreed, saying "Anyone who thinks this is anti-Semitism is certainly off base."

Candidate loses, then wins – probably

It was a wild week for Ontario Progressive Conservative candidate Gila Martow. First, it appeared she lost her Thornhill riding by a razor-thin 85 votes on election night to Liberal challenger Sandra Yeung Racco. Then her campaign was told by Elections Ontario the next day that a data entry error was discovered while the votes were being tabulated. The voting agency subsequently declared Martow the winner, also by a margin of 85 votes. Yeung Racco has asked for a judicial recount. Martow, a former optometrist, first won the riding in a 2013 byelection after incumbent PC MPP Peter Shurman resigned in a spending scandal. ■

COR brought kosher unity

I am bothered by some of the assumptions The CJN made in its series ("Behind the Label,") on the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR).

First, you assume competition is always a good thing. As an avowed capitalist, even I realize that we sometimes do need monopolies. For example, would you suggest we have competing police forces in Toronto?

Let's not forget that Toronto used to have competing kashrut bodies, and while the competition did not necessarily bring lower prices, it definitely brought disunity. COR has brought to Toronto a level of community kashrut unity that most of my friends who live elsewhere envy.

Second, I am not sure it is fair to blame COR for all the ills of the kosher world. For example, the challenge with kosher chickens in Ontario has nothing to do with COR. Rather, the issue is the lack of an open market in Canada for slaughtering chickens.

This also applies to the price of kosher food here as compared with the United States. The same car costs more in Canada than across the border, for example. In most cases, comparing costs between the U.S. and Canada has more to do with market regulations, taxes and manufacturer's pricing policies than anything else.

Do I believe COR is perfect? Only God gets that grade from me. But I do think COR faces a number of market challenges I hoped your articles would have expanded on.

Over the last few years, I believe COR's improved level of professionalism has become a standard for other kashrut bodies, and that its lay leadership deserves some praise. They have blemishes, and you do raise some points where COR could improve, but I would have hoped that somewhere in your series a reader could get the impression that kosher life in Toronto, while not perfect, is not that bad.

David Koschitzky

QuAIA part of larger problem

According to columnist Adam Goldenberg ("Just ignore Queers Against Israeli Apartheid," The CJN, June 12), Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) is "not worth anyone's time" because, according to him, "as threats to the Jewish People go, this one's fairly benign."

What Goldenberg fails to understand is that QuAIA is part of a larger problem for our community.

The Jewish left has become the fifth column in the Israel destruction project, supporting political groups who take part in or ignore the propaganda, because they support gayism or abortion.

To overlook the impact of the broader network of Jew-hate groups on the left, including QuAIA, Goldenberg is saying that the war on his people does not merit any attention. His concerns and sympathies are more with protecting gayism than Judaism. He takes offence with every small indication that some individuals do not wish to follow his way of life, but he is happy to let the haters of Israel go unchallenged and unopposed.

Thank you

I know of no better place to send a thank you letter to our community than through the pages of The CJN.

I wish to thank my many friends, relatives and former colleagues for the outpouring of affection my family received since the passing of my husband, Dr. Neil Kendal, on May 20.

More than 1,300 people came to the funeral to pay their respects and to support us.

Suddenly losing a husband at the tender age of 54 is heartbreaking and frightening. Without all of the special people in my life, my family would not have been able to move forward. Further, I would never have the strength to support my children without the outpouring of love and generous help I have continued to receive. There is no better tribute I could imagine for my husband than the constant flood of genuine kindness provided to us.

These acts of loving generosity will never be forgotten, and my children and I will try to learn and follow suit when we can help others.

My husband and I had so many plans that will now only live on in my dreams. We had 40 years of life together that will now only live on in my memories.

I pray his passing will be a wake-up call for all the men I love to slow down and enjoy life. Life is sometimes far too short.

Quoting Neil's favourite line, "Don't look back, you can never look back." ■

RABBI-2-RABBI

Judaism can't handle your boredom

But mitzvot and a sense of wonder can provide the antidote by letting us touch the most sublime parts of our being

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: I recently addressed our confirmation class (Grade 10 students). Here's an excerpt.

"I hope that by now you are on to the fact that Judaism is more than Bubbe's chicken soup. More than bagels and Jewish jokes. More than Israel. More than tzedakah More than Holocaust guilt. More than Mah Nishtanah at the seder table…

"Be curious. Question, challenge, and doubt what you think you've learned so far. Know that Judaism can take it… What Judaism can't handle is your boredom. Boredom is an insult to the Jewish leaders and scholars, artists and writers, teachers and activists who walked before you. Boredom is an affront to God, if I can be so bold as to say. If you are lazy or passive in your Jewish pursuits, you will find it lacking. But if you are rigorous in your studies, focused in your prayer practice, if you are committed to acts of chesed and passionate about acts of justice, you will never be bored."

Rabbi Fishman, do you think I went too far? Or perhaps not far enough?

Rabbi Fishman: Take a look at the number of hits websites such as bored.com receive daily to realize just how bored so many people (usually young people) are. Why are we so bored? I believe the answer can be found, at least partially, in the quality of our society today. Collectively, we live in a world where our desires and our wishes are just too easily satisfied. People do not long for things, they simple click to get them instantly. If we find our gratification not immediately met, we become bored at having to now wait for satisfactions to be quenched. Hence the immortal words of Mick Jagger: "I can't get no satisfaction."

Rabbi Splansky: King Solomon was bored. According to tradition, he tried women and wine, wealth, wisdom and power, too. All were fleeting. After living the life of privilege, Kohelet complained with a heavy sigh, "There is nothing new under the sun" (Ecclesiastes 1:9).

Boredom can trick us into believing there is no meaning, but the majority of the Hebrew Bible stands in opposition to Kohelet and asserts: Yes, there is meaning to be found! How so? Love. Give. Create. Devote. Commit. Affirm. Confirm.

Mitzvot can be a good antidote to boredom. Or do you find they, too, can become routine and boring?

Rabbi Fishman: At the heart of mitzvot is the process of building a relationship with God. If we misunderstand this point and simply think that we are doing good deeds, then eventually the repetitious act will become boring at best, negative and guilt-inducing at worst.

You are right. Mitzvot are the antidote to boredom, because within this understanding, we touch on the most sublime parts of our being – our lives as a process of constant becoming.

Rabbi Splansky: Wonder is perhaps the most accessible antidote to boredom.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel distinguishes philosophical wonder from spiritual wonder. In his book I Asked for Wonder, he explains: "To the prophets, wonder is a form of thinking. It is not the beginning of knowledge, but an act that goes beyond knowledge; it does not come to an end when knowledge is acquired; it is an attitude that never ceases."

In other words, a magic trick is amazing – until we learn how it works. But spiritual wonder can never be diminished. Even when we learn how a particular miracle of nature works, God can never be reduced to a trickster. When we learn the science of evolution, of the orbits, of an atom, they are no less wondrous, sometimes only more so.

Rabbi Fishman: When looking at the sky, a person can witness the spinning of the Earth and the fading of day into night. It can be seen as a sterile process of a repetitious event that happens each evening. It can be described in scientific words and given an almost sterile definition. Alternatively, one can appreciate that he or she is witnessing a sunset and the changing of the sky's colours of blue to red to purple to then seeing the stars. Wonder is ours, if only we are prepared to open our eyes and be amazed. ■

Bring back our boys

Eight years ago this month, Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit was captured by Hamas. During the five-plus years that followed, Schalit's redemption was the preoccupation of both the State of Israel, and Diapora Judaism. When he returned Oct. 18, 2011, some argued the price of his freedom – 1,027 Palestinian prisoners in exchange – was too high. But everyone was glad he was home.

The memory of Schalit's seizure on a June morning in 2006 is especially poignant in the wake of the kidnapping last Thursday of three Israeli teenagers – Gilad Shaar and Naftali Frenkel, both 16, and Eyal Yifrach, 19, the same age Schalit was when he was captured. There is no more instructive example of how Israel and worldwide Jewry will respond to this sort of terrorist act than the massive military, diplomatic and grassroots campaign to repatriate Schalit. Hopefully, the result will be the same. Ideally, it will come more quickly.

At press time Monday, Shaar, Frenkel and Yifrach, students at a yeshiva high school in Gush Etzion, were still missing. They were last seen late Thursday night near Hebron, at a hitchhiking spot. It remains unclear whether the boys were forcibly taken or tricked into accepting a ride with terrorists in disguise.

There appears to have been some confusion and lack of communication in the hours that followed the kidnapping. Opinions vary as to whether that gave the abductors enough time to smuggle the teens into Gaza. More likely, they are being held in the West Bank.

A massive manhunt has been underway since Friday night. On Saturday, an unnamed senior military official indicated to Israel's Channel 10 that security and intelligence forces had made some headway in the investigation, but warned, "This isn't going to be short."

Tens of thousands have gathered at the Kotel to pray for the release of the three students. Meanwhile, public and private prayer groups are being initiated across the Jewish world, and the hashtag #BringBackOurBoys is gaining steam on social media.

As the search continues, I offer this short prayer: Please, God, bring these three boys home, safe and sound, as quickly as possible. And in the meantime, watch over them and their loved ones.

June 20 marks the beginning of Pride Week (Israel held its own gay pride parade on June 13). This year, Toronto is hosting WorldPride, a distinction befitting Canada's progressive approach to the LGBTQ community. And yet, some LGBTQ Jews continue to struggle to establish their place in the Canadian Jewish community.

The good news, as reporter Jodie Shupac explains in this week's cover story, is "there appears to be a general shift towards emphasizing practical inclusion of LGBTQ congregants above rigid adherence to biblical text," a development that extends across Judaism, even to modern Orthodoxy. But the fear of isolation remains. As Rabbi Steven Greenberg writes, also in this week's CJN, "Right now, LGBTQ teenagers in your community are wondering whether there will be a place for them."

The question remains: Can complete integration ever be achieved? Taken together, Shupac and Greenberg illustrate the great strides Judaism has made toward embracing the LGBTQ community, and the roadblocks that still lie ahead. ■ — YONI

DISAPPEARING MIDEAST CHRISTIANS

Muslim persecution, not Israeli occupation, is to blame

Mike Fegelman

For many foreign news correspondents, the plight and flight of Christians under siege by Muslim extremists in the Middle East doesn't merit mention, and this proverbial elephant in the room continues to be ignored.

The systematic persecution of Christians by their Muslim neighbours and rulers in the Palestinian territories continues to evade the attention and scrutiny of the media year after year.

One would have hoped that with Pope Francis' recent trip to the region, this pressing issue would get the rightful attention it deserves in Canada's news media, but hopes are often dashed by doses of reality. Prominent media outlets such as the Globe and Mail failed to address the obvious red herring of the exodus of Christians from the West Bank and Gaza.

Reporting for the Globe, Mideast bureau chief Patrick Martin recently wrote a paean titled "Christians in the Middle East: Last one please blow out the candle." In his missive, Martin wrote: "While the Christians of Egypt, Iraq and Syria have reason to fear for their lives, the Christians of Palestine face a different threat. It's not from radical Islam, though that is present to some degree, nor is it as life-threatening. Their discomfort comes from the poor living conditions that result from the Israeli occupation and the territory's poor economy.

"The Israeli occupation of the West Bank has made life hell for many Palestinians, both Muslim and Christian. Israeli settlements have taken up much of the territory and Israeli roads, tunnels and the ugly security barrier that rings the district has cut across olive groves and farmers' fields."

Mike Fegelman

Of course, any credible assessment would require a balanced analysis, which is altogether lacking in this report. Martin altogether ignored Israel's security concerns, disregarded Muslim persecution of Christians, and effectively laid the entire blame at Israel's door. Nor did Martin attribute his statements to an expert source or disclose any facts to back up his assertions that Israel is the one contributing to the malaise of the area's Christians, not radical Islam. This is a classic case of disguising opinion as news.

Times Online columnist Michael Gove once said that "The parlous position of Palestinian Christians, indeed the difficult position of most Christians across the Arab world, is a consequence not of Israeli aggression, but of growing Islamist influence." Indeed, according to a report by the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, the Christian population in the West Bank and Gaza is likely to dissipate completely within the next 15 years as a result of increasing Muslim persecution and maltreatment.

Indeed, most West Bank Christians live in cities such as Nablus, Jericho and Ramallah, which are under Palestinian Authority control. Once 15 per cent of the population, Christians now make up less than two per cent. Israel's former ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, has argued that "when Bethlehem was under Israeli control, the city's Christian population grew by 57 per cent. But under the Palestinian Authority since 1995, those numbers have plummeted. Palestinian gunmen seized Christian homes – compelling Israel to build a protective barrier between them and Jewish neighbourhoods – and then occupied the Church of the Nativity, looting it and using it as a latrine. Today, Christians comprise a mere one-fifth of their holy city's population."

As an Ottawa Citizen editorial observed: "Bethlehem, for many, many centuries an entirely Christian town, has now been largely depopulated of Christians. While this is generally explained, in media accounts, as the result of 'harsh Israeli security measures,' other factors may well have contributed to the exodus, such as violent impositions of the Shariah code, the takeover of their church by Palestinian gunmen in 2002, and the hideous desecration that followed, the use of Christian homes by 'militants' of both Fatah and Hamas as cover for the shelling of Jewish targets in south Jerusalem, and sundry murderous attacks on Christians around the town during the Al Aqsa intifadah and since. Against which background, the loss of the pilgrim trade has deprived the dwindling Christian community of their chief source of income. The town is now overwhelmingly Muslim, and may be Christian-free very soon."

Indeed, the U.S. State Department paints a grim picture of Hamas-run Gaza and the Palestinian Authority's administration of the West Bank, citing institutionalized discrimination by Hamas and the Palestinian Authority against the Christian minority under its control. The trend goes the opposite way in Israel, where the Christian community's population has quadrupled since the creation of the modern State of Israel in 1948

In other words, only in Israel is the Middle East Christian community growing. There are roughly 161,000 Christians living in Israel, equalling about two per cent of the population, up from 158,000 in 2012

As Oren observed: "Christians are prominent in all aspects of Israeli life, serving in the Knesset, the Foreign Ministry and on the Supreme Court. They are exempt from military service, but thousands have volunteered and been sworn in on special New Testaments printed in Hebrew. Israeli Arab Christians are on average more affluent than Israeli Jews and better-educated, even scoring higher on their SATs. This does not mean that Israeli Christians do not occasionally encounter intolerance. But in contrast to elsewhere in the Middle East where hatred of Christians is ignored or encouraged, Israel remains committed to its Declaration of Independence pledge to 'ensure the complete equality of all its citizens irrespective of religion.' It guarantees free access to all Christian holy places, which are under the exclusive aegis of Christian clergy. When Muslims tried to erect a mosque near the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth, the Israeli government interceded to preserve the sanctity of the shrine."

Sadly, it seems that some journalists, including the Globe's Martin, are more interested in tarring Israel with false libels than drawing attention to the real persecution of Christians in the Middle East. ■

Same-sex marriage and beyond

How inclusive are Canadian shuls?

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Had they gotten engaged one year later, Orrin Wolpert and his husband, Mitchell Marcus, would have been married by the rabbi at the downtown Toronto synagogue to which they now belong, the First Narayever Congregation.

The traditional egalitarian synagogue changed its policy on allowing same-sex weddings in June 2009, 10 months after the couple planned their ceremony.

At the time, Wolpert and Marcus were involved with the Narayever, but weren't members, unwilling to belong to a shul that disallowed gay weddings.

They asked a Reform rabbi they both knew to officiate at their August 2009 wedding, and subsequently joined Narayever in accordance with the synagogue's new stance.

"I feel really strongly about the shul," said Wolpert, who comes from a traditional background.

"It's an amazing community of passionate Jews who are very traditional in their practice yet very inclusive in their approach... the membership is very intellectual, very socially progressive... we feel totally included there."

Wolpert worked on the Narayever's board for two years, ran its social action committee, helped draft the language on its website and attends services with his husband and their two-year-old twins about once a month.

The congregation honoured them with an aufruf prior to their wedding, a brit milah for their son and a simchat bat for their daughter.

Wolpert and Marcus' sense of total acceptance by their synagogue is not anomalous, but neither is it the norm.

Over the past decade or so, as Canadian legislation and large swathes of public opinion have come to recognize the rights of homosexual couples to marry and access attendant legal benefits, Canadian synagogues across denominations have been confronted with the expectation to assert where they stand on LGBTQ inclusion.

Created in 1984, Holy Blossom Temple's "rainbow chupah" was inspired by imagery from the story of Noah's Ark. Thirty years later, Holy Blossom's rabbi, Yael Splansky, says the chupah signals to the LGBTQ Jews of Toronto that "Holy Blossom looks forward to providing a warm welcome to them." JODIE SHUPAC PHOTO

Given the traditional Jewish view that homosexual sex is biblically prohibited, the issue continues to be sensitive for many synagogues, and, in some cases, one that requires an overhaul of entrenched values.

And it's not just the question of whether to allow same-sex marriage. Synagogues and rabbis across the board are increasingly establishing – both formally and informally – positions on their overall approaches to including LGBTQ congregants, in matters such as ritual participation, educational programming and use of language.

While levels of acceptance tend to vary widely among synagogues and rabbis – even within the bounds of a given denomination – there appears to be a general shift toward emphasizing practical inclusion of LGBTQ congregants above rigid adherence to biblical text.

Reform, Reconstructionist and progressive, non-denominational synagogues across North America have generally embraced LGBTQ members as equal participants, both by officiating at same-sex weddings and offering full involvement in ritual and executive proceedings.

In 1999, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the principal association of Reform rabbis in Canada and the United States, green-lighted same-sex marriages, but left the decision whether to officiate at them up to individual rabbis.

For some Reform leaders, then, change has been more gradual.

This past April, Rabbi Yael Splansky became senior rabbi at Toronto's Reform Holy Blossom Temple and the first rabbi in the synagogue's history to perform same-sex weddings.

"For years here [as an associate or assistant rabbi], I wouldn't, out of respect for my senior colleagues, officiate at same-sex weddings."

Rabbi Splansky said Holy Blossom has long supported the LGBTQ community in other ways. The shul is an ongoing sponsor of Jewish LGBTQ group Kulanu's Pride Parade float and it supported gay Jewish men afflicted by AIDS in the 1980s and early 1990s.

The drawing of lines around "acceptable" and "unacceptable" forms of inclusion continues to be quite common among synagogues.

Unity government is a contradiction that won't last

Paul Michaels

In the immediate aftermath of the formation June 2 of the Fatah-Hamas "unity" government – consisting of non-political "technocrats" – there have been both predictable and unpredictable reactions.

Predictably, the international community raced to embrace the new government, despite Hamas' refusal to endorse the 2006 conditions set by the Quartet (the European Union, UN, United States and Russia): recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence, and accept PLO-Israel agreements. The rationale for the embrace, including by the United States (which most expected would take a wait-and-see approach) is that since none of the new government's 17 cabinet ministers is a Hamas member and Hamas "merely" supports the government externally, the Quartet conditions on Hamas' inclusion have not been violated.

Furthermore, PA President Mahmoud Abbas claims the unity government itself accepts the Quartet conditions, although there's no formal policy statement to that effect. Yet, Hamas, while supporting the government (appointing four ministers), rejects the conditions Abbas says the government has agreed to.

To Israeli and other observers, this is simply an effort to square a circle.

Unpredictably, it was the New York Times, usually critical of Israel, which, in its June 6 editorial "Israeli-Palestinian Collision Course," said that "some skepticism" expressed by the Israeli administration is warranted: "Many experts say that if there is ever to be an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement, admittedly a distant dream at this point, the Palestinians must be united. But the United States has to be careful to somehow distinguish between its support for the new government and an endorsement of Hamas and its violent, hateful behaviour. To have some hope of doing that, the United States and Europe must continue to insist that Mr. Abbas stick to his promises and not allow Hamas to get the upper hand."

It's precisely the prospect of Hamas' getting the upper hand that worries Israeli analysts. In a June 4 Times of Israel article, Ehud Ya'ari warned that instead of being interested in healing the rift with Fatah dating from Hamas' violent overthrow of Fatah in Gaza in 2007 – as of this writing the groups continue to bicker, even arresting each other's members – what Hamas really wants is to transplant "the Hezbollah model from Lebanon to Palestine."

While Abbas is nominally in charge of Gaza (Hamas' government there having been dissolved), Hamas has said it will refuse to disband its 20,000-strong armed forces and security personnel or let them come under PA rule. Nor will it stop producing missiles, estimated now at 10,000.

Even if Hamas doesn't win presidential and parliamentary elections scheduled to take place in six months (though well-known Palestinian journalist Khaled Abu Toameh already predicts victory for Hamas), it could end up in a position to destabilize the West Bank. Like Hezbollah, Hamas would have political clout as well as an independent military or "resistance" force – just as, in Lebanon, Hezbollah forces are separate from, and far stronger than, the Lebanese army.

No wonder dovish Israeli President Shimon Peres, on his way June 8 with Abbas to meet Pope Francis at the Vatican for a "peace prayer," warned the Fatah-Hamas partnership is a "contradiction that won't last." "One is in favour of terror and one is against terror. That won't work… You can't have water and fire in the same glass."

Several Israel commentators have argued that Israel, once again, lost the PR battle to Abbas by immediately condemning the unity government instead of accepting it and subsequently shifting the focus to Hamas, insisting it reform and comply with Quartet conditions. David Horovitz, founding editor of The Times of Israel, however, asked the following: "Rather than rushing to embrace a Palestinian government in which an unreformed Hamas is a central component, what was to stop the U.S. conditioning its acceptance on a reform of Hamas?" Good question. ■

We can all take part in the mitzvah of challah

Rabbi Sean Gorman

In my trips up and down the Bathurst Street corridor in Toronto, I see numerous signs for programs in the Jewish community. One that caught my eye was a program to get 1,000 women to bake challah on May 14. Two thoughts went through my mind. The first was, "Great idea!" The second was, "Am I allowed to take part?" I bake challah, and I am a man.

When the Gorman family first came to Toronto nine years ago, I was amazed at the number of people who baked challah. As I think further about those people, the majority are men. They include rabbis, professors, doctors and lawyers. They take their challah personally.

These bakers use a variety of ingredients. Many use sugar. I use honey. One colleague uses multigrain flour. I use a combination of white and white whole wheat flours (you read that correctly) only available in the United States. Bakers put poppy seeds, sesame seeds or streusel on top. I also use sunflower seeds. During the summer, I use ice cream sprinkles.

When my younger son was three, he called a round pull-apart challah a cupcake hallah. Since then, we always have a cupcake challah on the table. When our eldest was a toddler, he pilfered two still-warm challot from the counter. I found him feasting on the kitchen floor. It's a family joke that I can braid a challah, but I cannot braid my daughter's hair.

Once, after a busy week, my spouse, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, bought challah. We have wonderful bakeries in Toronto, but my kids were emphatically displeased. Nothing beats homemade.

The spiritual dimension to baking challah also has practical side. The challah gets a wonderful bottom when baked on a stone. I bake with honey. Honey yields softer bread. I learned from Jennifer to measure the oil, then use the same measuring cup for the honey. If you like raisins (I prefer dates), soaking them in rum will help them remain sweeter.

As with most mitzvot, men and women can perform this one on equal terms. It is a delight to bake with Jennifer. We celebrate Shabbat as a family. We eat together. We daven together. We play games and go for walks together. It's a joy to prepare for Shabbat together. Gentlemen, I urge you to take part in this mitzvah. This privilege is not limited to our spouses. We should not wait until signs appear along Bathurst to assume our rightful place at the breadboard.

There is rabbinic debate about when Shabbat begins. Is it sundown? Is it 18 minutes prior? Is it in the liturgy? The answer to all those questions is a resounding "no." Shabbat begins about 10 minutes after you put the challah in the oven, when the smell of baking bread drifts through the house.

Jennifer and I would like to invite all of you to our home for challah. That is, alas, difficult. Instead, I would like to share my favourite recipe with you. ■

Rabbi Sean Gorman is rabbi at The Pride of Israel Synagogue in Toronto

- ❑ 1-1/2 cups water
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 2-1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 cup oil
- ❑ 1/2 cup honey
- ❑ 5-2/3 cups flour
- ❑ 1 tbsp. gluten (adds protein and texture)
- ❑ 3-1/2 tsp. yeast

Put ingredients into a bread machine on the dough cycle.

Sprinkle corn meal on a baking sheet. Shape the challah the way you like it and place on the baking sheet. If preferred, add raisins. Crack an egg into a cup. Add a sprinkle of salt. Scramble. Paint the hallah.

Let rise until doubled in size (75 minutes or so). Preheat oven to 350. Paint the bread with the egg wash again. Sprinkle seeds. Bake for 28-30 minutes, turning halfway. When it sounds hollow on the bottom, it is finished. The space between the braids should look like light brown toast.

For a nice change, dip in olive oil and za'atar instead of salt.

Taking the good of the whole into account

Rabbi Jay Kelman

The Supreme Court of Canada, in a unanimous decision no less, recently upheld the right of a law firm to force a partner to retire at age 65. Yet had this partner been an employee, he would not have been forced to retire solely because of age. The court argued that employees are in a vulnerable position and in need of protection, while partners, as owners, need no protection from themselves. It seems that such an argument has no basis in Jewish law, and if anything, the reverse would be true.

Jewish law goes to great lengths to protect and ensure proper treatment of an employee. Giving somebody busy work that serves little benefit to the firm runs afoul of the Torah's prohibition of avodat parech, demeaning work. Not coincidentally, this is the exact term used by the Torah in describing the work the Egyptians forced our ancestors to perform. While not all agree, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that an employer may not fire an adequate worker in order to replace him with an exceptional one. At the same time, a worker can generally quit with little if any notice. This right ensures that a worker not feel enslaved to their job.

Of course, one who signs a contract is expected to carry out its terms. As such, a recent court ruling disallowing a senior vice-president at BlackBerry from joining Apple would seem to be in consonance with Jewish law. In that case, the employee in question had signed a contract agreeing to give six months notice before quitting. While no one can be forced to work against their will (with the possible exception of essential workers, such as doctors and teachers), one would have to pay damages resulting from breach of contract. And even when there are no damages, moral censure is in order.

Yet when all is said and done, employers are entitled to run their companies in the way they see fit. While replacing workers may present a problem, letting them go in order to increase profits or due to increased use of technology is less so. At its core, giving an employee a job is an act of charity – the highest level of charity one can perform – enabling those hired to be self-sufficient. The fact this charitable act may benefit the donor even more so has little bearing on the fact the employer is providing a means to make a living. But charity has its limits. While there may be no reason to do so, and while one should definitely take employee needs into account, an employer is within his or her rights to have a policy that staff must retire at a certain age.

However, forcing a partner to retire is a different matter. The court actually left open the possibility that a junior partner with little or no control might be protected as an employee, but not a partner who exercised control. It's precisely because a partner exercises control and thereby demonstrates ownership that forcing him to retire would seem problematic. Yet at the same time, the partners must act in the best interest of the partnership and not in their own personal interests, a point noted by the court. And it might very well be that a partnership is better off by retiring people at a certain age – or perhaps by using some other criteria – to allow new talent to flourish. A majority vote of the partners – with each partner's vote count tied to their ownership share – to this effect would bind all.

While the above may seem relevant only to partners and employees – a large group no doubt – it has relevance for all. A democracy is a very large partnership where all members have an equal share. As such when voting – and while Ontario's provincial election has passed, Toronto's municipal one has not – each partner must vote in the best interests of the partnership as a whole. ■

The nature of trust

Norma Baumel Joseph

Mohamed Hersi warned a supposed friend: "You have to think… trust nobody." Fool that he is, he should have taken his own advice. The friend he spoke to was an undercover Toronto police officer. Hersi was arrested and found guilty of trying to join Al Shabab, a Somalia-based terrorist organization. His advice strikes at the heart of how we live our lives.

Do we walk around suspicious of everyone, afraid to put our trust or faith in any human being? Or do we choose to live our lives as though the world is a safe place and innocently rely on humanity?

In the world we live in, the decision is never so stark. We might wisely choose not to trust politicians, but how much must we trust doctors? We have a responsibility to exercise a level of judgment in our dealings with people. Some will disappoint, others will appear to exemplify trustful standards.

My concern is not with particular individuals and incidents, but rather with an approach to life. The famous Shakespearean quote can be applied: To be or not to be in a trusting relationship with the world around us. Do we look at life as a positive experience, enabling an open approach or do we withdraw from life, expecting constant frustrations?

What does trusting entail? I do not think this approach is simply about a naïve or unquestioning stance. It is also not necessarily based on experience. Rather it entails a choice to take a positive stance, to believe the sun will come up tomorrow, so to speak.

I trust the world will go on and I will continue to be in it as an active presence. I know at some point I will not be here and that I will lose loved ones, but I cannot – or choose not to – conduct my life on that basis. For sanity's sake, I will suspend my suspicious nature. I want to accept individuals as basically good, even though I read about all the evil in the world. I could focus on distrust, but it gets me nowhere.

So even though I have reasons to doubt and to see the evil of this world, I choose to have a basic level of confidence. I want to trust people and see their actions in a positive light.

This disposition may run against logic and caution, but it puts me in a good space vis-a-vis life. Surely this attitude requires some level of restraint and action. One cannot blithely proceed without some trepidation. Circumspection is a prerequisite. One must be careful in whom to place trust. Look to deeds. Learn from experience.

But our own actions must also be placed on the agenda. In order to trust, we must act in a trustworthy manner. That involves levels of personal integrity and faithfulness, but also performances displaying conviction.

In this regard, the story of Miriam is instructive. More than Moses, his sister displays levels of reliability and loyalty. She stands by, watching the baby Moses, sure that she can help, that something good will be possible. Unlike Hagar who cries in Genesis, certain that the end has come for her child, Miriam behaves with assurance.

But her most significant act comes after the crossing of the sea. She leads the women in song and dance, praising God. Where did the women get their drums? Midrash tells us that the righteous women trusted in God's deliverance and were prepared for thankfulness. When escaping slavery they thought to take their instruments with them. Not only did they believe, they also acted on their belief. Our tradition gives us many examples of those who, like Nachshon, jump into the water, accepting and trusting God's guidance.

Can we live like that, carrying our timbrels ready to say thank you? Maybe we have to. ■

Cisco hopes for peace dividend in PA investment

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Back when he was in the Senate, Jerry Grafstein made the case that the best way to lay the groundwork for peace in the Middle East was to foster economic development in the region. When people have a stake in peace, they are less likely to opt for war, he suggested.

It turns out he wasn't the only one thinking along those lines. In Israel itself, the local branch of high-tech giant Cisco has embarked on a project designed to help Palestinian society foster development of a middle class. As part of the company's corporate social responsibility mandate, it's investing $15 million "for economic development in the Palestinian territories," said Gai Hetzroni, senior manager of corporate affairs for Cisco in Israel.

Hetzroni was in Toronto last week along with a 25-person delegation of Palestinian businesspeople to meet with Canadian companies that have an interest in their services or products. The Palestinian firms represented the agribusiness, tourism, information communication and technology (ICT) sectors. The trade mission was sponsored by the Canadian-funded Export Development Project, the Palestinian Trade Centre and the Department of Foreign Affairs Trade and Development.

The Palestinian firms attended the Canadian Arab Chamber of Commerce trade show at the International Centre in Mississauga, held business-to-business meetings and laid the groundwork for future co-operation.

For his part, Hetzroni said Cisco first targeted the Palestinian tech sector in 2009, outsourcing several projects to firms in that region. "We're trying to build the ecosystem that partially exists in the Palestinian territories," he said.

Gai Hetzroni

Cisco also invested in improving "the soft skills" that are part of the international high tech milieu, from the language employed in doing business, to the transparent way companies relate to their clients, to managing people and managing programs. The company's Israeli employees conduct monthly seminars for Palestinians in Ramallah or in a location on the Dead Sea, Hetzroni said.

To date, there has been plenty of interaction between Cisco's Israeli employees and staff from Palestinian companies, which have benefited from Cisco's outsourcing.

"On a personal level, people don't have any issues. When you talk about politics, it can become problematic," he said.

Hetzroni, a software developer who also managed Cisco's R & D, said he's found a number of similarities between Israeli and Palestinian personnel. "They laugh at the same jokes, their body language is similar and it's easier to understand each other than it is people from India or China," he said.

Palestinians "say they need to learn from Israel about building high tech. Many Palestinians have friends in the industry in Israel, and they feel it is wise to do business in Israel," Hetzroni said.

The Israeli government has facilitated the exchange by granting permits, allowing a fairly free movement of people between Cisco's office in Netanya and Ramallah in the Palestinian territories.

Hetzroni sees lots of upside in the endeavour. "If the middle class in a good, strong economic shape, then that reduces the level of hate," he said. "I do it because I believe that providing jobs, a healthy economic environment will reduce tension and help us live in quiet.

"The politicians are not fast enough in the process, so the private sector is following a bottom-up approach. If the business connections are strong enough, the politicians will have to follow," he said.

One of the Palestinians in the trade mission agrees. East Jerusalem-born Kais Salhut said "economic partnerships are going to be a major contributor to peace.

"It serves a humanistic goal, and being a Palestinian, also a nationalistic goal," said Salhut, CEO of iConnect Tech, a company with offices in Chicago and Ramallah.

The bottom line, is that it's also good for business, he added.

Palestinian Arabs are not the only people benefiting from Cisco's corporate social responsibility policy.

"Cisco has a program to integrate Israeli Arabs into high-tech industry," Hetzroni said. "And Cisco supports a program to integrate the ultra-Orthodox into the high tech world.

"The biggest problem with the Israeli economy is that 30 per cent of the population – 20 per cent Arab and 10 per cent Orthodox – are not part of it," he said.

The unemployment rates in both communities are high, while the education level "is not up to that of the Jewish community."

Ma'antech, a program founded by Cisco and outgoing President Shimon Peres, is aimed at the Israeli Arab community.

It draws on the support of a coalition of blue chip high tech firms "to make efforts to hire Israeli Arabs," Hetzroni said.

Kamatech is a similar program geared to the ultra-Orthodox, likewise supported by a group of Israel-based high tech companies. Kamatech provides diversity workshops to the firms to explain the cultural differences they might expect when interacting with ultra-Orthodox Jews. It also runs programs to upgrade the educational standards of Orthodox employees in core subjects, such as math and English.

"We're trying to bridge the gap," Hetzroni said.

Cisco's Networking Academy prepares young members of the Orthodox community to become PC technicians or network administrators, he added.

The company expects to enrol around 400 young people in the program in the next two years. ■

Baycrest launches new online brain cognition test

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Barb Dixon has a thing for tests.

Having spent 14 years testing software as director of a company's software quality assurance, the 71-year-old retiree and resident of an adult lifestyle community in Freelton, Ont., says "test-taking is very close to my heart – it's something I love to do."

When the Canadian Association for Retired Persons (CARP) put out a call about a year ago for volunteers to participate in a trial for a new online brain test being developed by Cogniciti Inc. – a company owned by Baycrest Health Sciences and MaRS Discovery District whose mission is to bring "brain health solutions to people" Dixon didn't hesitate to sign up.

She was one of 300 adults ages 50 to 79 who Cogniciti recruited to try out versions of the test over the course of a year.

The online self-assessment tool, which launched May 26, is free and can be accessed by anyone at www.cogniciti.com. It's designed for people 50 to 79 who want to see whether their memory and attention capacities fall within a normal range for their age, education level and general state of health.

Though the test can't replace a doctor's clinical assessment, Angela Troyer, a Baycrest neuropsychologist and director of the centre's memory and aging program, along with Baycrest senior scientist Brian Levine created it to be a cognitive check-up, a first step for people concerned about changes to their memory or cognition.

Memory and attention can be affected by normal aging processes and by brain disease, explained Cogniciti president Michael Meagher. The test helps people determine if their cognitive functions are "normal" or if they indicate a problem – this could mean a neurological disease or something much more benign.

Troyer explained: "If somebody has a problem on this test, we don't know if it's a neurological disease. It could be, but it could also be because of things like depression, anxiety or medication side effects. Or maybe they didn't understand the instructions or got distracted."

Test-takers receive an overall score of their cognitive health, and can save their results if they want to track their performance over time. If someone scores poorly, he or she is encouraged to re-take the test after a week and if the score remains low, to follow up with a doctor.

Angela Troyer

Despite her confidence, Dixon said she found the test, which contains various cognitive activities and includes assessments for immediate and delayed memory, to be quite difficult.

"There was one part I found easy, because it played into the logic of a computer programmer, which I once was, but there was a part where we had to match different faces and names and that was quite challenging."

Dixon scored within the normal range, which was comforting, but not a surprise.

"Prior to the test I hadn't had any worries. There's no Alzheimer's or dementia in my family. My sisters are in their 80s and are still sharp."

Her husband, 72, refuses to take the test.

"He's that kind of person. He says, 'If I have something, I don't want to know.' And I think there's a big segment of the population who feels that way… I found that when I sent the test to friends."

But according to Troyer, "there's clearly an appetite for this kind of tool… A lot of people don't know if what they experience cognitively is normal aging or not."

Two weeks after its launch, about 30,000 users have taken it.

She said it took three years to develop the test, which her team adapted from research and existing clinical tests, taking care to account for individual variability.

"We spent a lot of time making sure the test wasn't too easy or too hard, to cover that whole span of what's normal."

She stressed that a low score does not necessarily signify dementia. Some causes of memory decline are treatable, such as thyroid disease, mental health issues or vitamin deficiency.

"It's not a diagnostic tool. We say, 'If you have an unusual score, get it checked [with a doctor].'" ■

Mount Sinai partners in $10M Crohn's study

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dr. Ken Croitoru

A Toronto doctor buffeted by $10 million in new research funding still has a daunting task. Before a cure for Crohn's disease can be found, its cause must be determined.

One of several inflammatory bowel diseases, Crohn's affects some 130,000 Canadians. According to Mount Sinai Hospital, Canada has one of the world's highest rates of Crohn's. More alarmingly, the number of new cases of the disease in Canadian children has almost doubled since 1995.

Recent research shows that Ashkenazi Jews are four times more likely to get it than any other group.

Mount Sinai is partnering with nine hospitals and health centres in Israel to conduct the largest study of its kind to identify the cause of Crohn's disease, a chronic illness of the digestive system. It's part of the Genetics, Environmental, Microbial (GEM) Project, founded at the hospital in 2008.

In April, the project announced $10 million in new funding – $6 million from the U.S. Helmsley Charitable Trust and $4 million from Crohn's and Colitis Canada and Mount Sinai Hospital. It was billed as the largest single donation in Canadian history dedicated to Crohn's research.

There are lots of treatments for Crohn's, "but none of them offer a cure. They just control the disease to varying degrees," the study's lead researcher, Dr. Ken Croitoru, a gastroenterologist at Mount Sinai, told The CJN in an interview. "This study is designed to try and identify what the trigger is for the disease, or maybe even the cause, because once you understand that, you actually have the opportunity to redesign treatments that might lead to a cure."

One current theory about a cause is genetic predisposition "that somehow influences the way the body's immune system interacts with something in the environment," Croitoru said. However, "it's not clear whether it's the air we breathe, the water we drink, or specific bacteria."

Diet, he said, is a consideration but only as part of one's environment. "Diet may have ingredients that might trigger the inflammation or make it worse. We have just been unable to identify specific components of diet that might be responsible."

Crohn's usually affects the intestines, which become inflamed and thick, but it can occur anywhere in the digestive tract. The bodies of sufferers overreact to normal bacteria in the intestines. Typical ages of onset are 15 to 35, but it can occur at any age. Its main symptoms are fatigue, loss of appetite, abdominal cramps, fever, weight loss, and others.

Treatments include use of steroids but only in the short term due to their side effects. Over the past decade, a new class of drugs called biologics hold promise because they are engineered to block a certain protein thought to play an important role in inflammation.

"The clinical data show this can be very effective in some patients," Croitoru said.

In 2012, researchers, led by Inga Peter, a geneticist at Mount Sinai, discovered five new genetic mutations that make Ashkenazi Jews four times more likely than other populations to develop Crohn's disease.

Croitoru said it's been observed that Crohn's is more prevalent in developed countries in northern latitudes.

Study to measure environmental, genetic factors

Despite the partnership with Israeli centres, his team has no hard numbers on the incidence of Crohn's in Israel, though he feels it's probably similar to western rates despite its southern location, but perhaps offset by its high Ashkenazi population.

Anecdotally, it appears that Sephardi Jews in Israel have a lower incidence of Crohn's than their Ashkenazi cousins, "but when they come to Canada, they get the Canadian incidence," he explained, underscoring a possible environmental cause.

The study will measure both environmental and genetic factors. To do that, researchers will look at healthy relatives – siblings or children – of people living with Crohn's. To date, the GEM project has recruited more than 2,800 participants, with another 2,200 to be found in the United Kingdom, France and the United States.

"What we want to do is to study someone who's going to develop Crohn's before we actually know they're going to develop it," Croitoru said. He said the likelihood of a healthy first-degree relative of a Crohn's subject developing the disease is about 0.3 per cent per year.

So with 5,000 subjects over a five- or six-year period, researchers hope to find about 70 new cases of Crohn's, he explained. "That's the number we're really after. We think that with 70 such patients, we may be able to detect a signal that tells us why they're different than those of the same cohort who don't develop Crohn's disease."

Although outside the scope of the GEM study, researchers at the Meir Medical Center and Sackler Faculty of Medicine in Israel have found that cannabis can help relieve symptoms of Crohn's disease. ■

Dr. Laffa to open franchises

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Dr. Laffa, the popular kosher restaurant that opened on Magnetic Drive in North York about four years ago, is looking to expand by selling franchises throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

Richard Rabkin, managing director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, which supervises Dr. Laffa under its COR hechsher, said this may be the first time in Canada that a kosher establishment has sold franchises.

"We don't keep records of that, but we are not aware of anyone else who has done it," Rabkin said.

Dr. Laffa owner Sasi Haba said he's currently in talks to have two new franchises – including one deep in Toronto's downtown core – open later this year.

Haba has another company-owned takeout outlet at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue.

He said it's still too early to share any details about the new franchises.

"There are a lot of changes... We hope that in the next two or three weeks, everything will be sure. We have some offers around the city, plus one downtown, and we'd be happy to open the first express kosher place there," Haba said. ■

Ontario election result holds a message for Jews

Martin Goldfarb

At first glance, it might seem the recently contested election in Ontario revealed few, if any, implications for the province's Jewish community. Such thinking fails to account for the important story this election has illuminated.

To the great surprise of many pollsters, the election was a major Liberal success, especially in urban ridings. Clearly, a significant number of Jews voted Liberal – even in ridings where the Progressive Conservatives ran Jewish candidates. The take-away is that many Jews voted Liberal because they believed a government led by Premier Kathleen Wynne was the more stable and fair-minded choice.

The PCs and soon-to-be-former leader Tim Hudak ran a campaign of confrontation and conflict that promised unrest – especially in the public service sector, where Hudak surprisingly promised to slash 100,000 jobs. In my experience, Jewish voters tend to get twitchy and anxious in times of political uncertainty, and that's why the Jewish community also chose to vote against Hudak.

Like all communities, Jews vote based on our own self-interests. Certainly we care about Israel, but our personal interests run deep, too. The Jewish community understands that liberal democracy is necessary, but not entirely sufficient. As a general rule, Jewish communities thrive when paired with non-dogmatic and open governments.

This election proves that the Jewish community cares about issues like maintaining a successful public school system, the environment, the charter, the Supreme Court, social welfare, justice and safety. Jews care about these issues because they influence their daily lives. They are committed to a fair and just society, because they know it is only in such a society that they will continue to thrive. It's in their best interest to support political parties that adhere to these values.

The Jewish community cares about helping more people live better – and to that end, in my mind, the recent election in Ontario sends a clear message to Prime Minister Stephen Harper: Jews want their government to be pro-Israel, but not to the exclusion of a fair-minded, non-confrontational method of governing. Harper seems to adhere to a more aggressive manner of governing – that much has been evident in his approach to the census, the Supreme Court, citizenship, a women's right to choose and other social welfare issues. For some, these and similar actions are not in keeping with Jewish values.

> Many Jews voted Liberal because they believed a government led by Premier Kathleen Wynne was the more stable and fair-minded choice.

Most Jews express unequivocal support for the State of Israel, but this election suggests many of them could reject a party that comes across as overly truculent. Why? Because we understand instinctively that such governments can be bad for Jews. A fair society is what we want.

Harper and his Conservatives must learn from this election – and so should the Jewish community. Ontarian, and all Canadian, Jews need to feel that the Jewish organizations that represent them in Canada are responding to issues within Canada – issues that affect them each and every day. Politically speaking, this means groups like the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) need to be sensitive to issues here in Canada that Jews care about. This is not to say that these sorts of groups can't focus on Israel, only that they cannot do so exclusively (or at least close to it). The strength of Jewish groups, including CIJA, will come from meeting the needs of their community.

All people, Jews included, tend to vote in their own self-interest. In the case of the Jewish community, this means we lean toward fair-minded and kinder governments. Issues directly affecting Ontarian Jewish voters dominated this election – the parties' respective positions on Israel were of much less concern, and anti-Semitism fears were even further behind. As a result, it appears Ontario's Jews chose to vote for a government dominated by Kathleen Wynne and the Liberals. ■

Calgary student resigns Hillel post over Israel views

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Jake Birrell

University of Calgary student Kate Jacobson, who was voted in as Calgary Hillel's incoming Israel chair in April, resigned from her post last week following a backlash from Hillel members who opposed comments she made online that were critical of Israel.

One comment, posted on a Facebook thread last January, said, "The Israeli government has massacred children, and if we're not willing to change – to give democratic and human rights to all peoples living in the area of Israel-Palestine, then I think we should question whether that's a state we want the word 'Jewish' attached to."

Another was posted later that month on the Calgary United With Israel (CUWI) website after the group criticized the University of Calgary's independent student newspaper, the Gauntlet, for running a piece that advocated violence against Israelis.

In her defence of the newspaper, for which she is a contributor, Jacobson wrote, "I'm a Labour Zionist and a state that has murdered Palestinian children (and they have, children have died) is not a state I necessarily want the name of my people attached to."

When Jake Birrell, a 20-year-old sociology student at Mount Royal University and a Hillel member, learned about Jacobson's comments, he circulated an email to the media and the Jewish community calling for her resignation.

Birrell wrote that he was "disgusted that a person with views such as her own is representing me and other Zionist Jews in our community."

Birrell, who is also a CUWI member, threatened to drop out as a member of Calgary Hillel if Jacobson didn't resign from her post as Hillel's Israel chair.

"It bothers me, because she's representing a Jewish-based organization," Birrell told The CJN.

"I wouldn't be as upset if she wasn't in a leadership position and didn't have people looking to her for guidance when it comes to the topic of Israel. I found it completely disgusting that she's on the Israel board, but she slams Israel. It doesn't make any sense to me."

Jacobson, an 18-year-old international relations student, said that despite her decision to step down, she stands by her political views.

"My view on Israel isn't any more right or wrong, or more Jewish or less Jewish than anyone else's view on Israel. This is just how I personally and politically feel about the State of Israel. I have a more left-wing opinion, which is fine. CUWI has, on a political spectrum, a more right-wing opinion, and that's fine, too. Their opinion isn't more or less valid than mine," she said.

> I found it completely disgusting that she's on the Israel board but she slams Israel

Jacobson added that she will remain on the Hillel executive board, "focusing on other work in the community."

"I believe that what I said doesn't convey the full depth of my political beliefs. I have a right to my political beliefs and I should be able to stay on the board and represent Jewish students and the Jewish community," she said.

Calgary Hillel director Kira Blumer said Jacobson's decision to resign from the post was the right thing to do, because "she appears to be subscribing to a particular political belief and if she is representing all Jewish students on campus, it's going to be hard for her to do her job effectively."

A statement from Calgary Hillel said the student group "embraces diversity and encourages debate among our students, which is integral to the development of a strong Zionist identity. We will continue to strive to represent students from a broad set of backgrounds and personal beliefs." ■

Pro golfer Pressel talks pucks with best of them

plungen@thecjn.ca

Morgan Pressel hails from the Sunshine State, where golf, tennis, football, baseball and basketball – maybe even jai alai – are front runners on the sports pages, well ahead of that import from the north, hockey. But she can talk pucks with the best of them.

Ask her to name her favourite players on her favourite team, the Detroit Red Wings, and Steve Yzerman and Nicklas Lidstrom top her list. But it's hard to ignore Pavel Datsyuk from the current edition of the Red Wings, she said.

Pretty impressive, but can she recall the third-pairing left-shooting defenceman for the Wings from those cup-winning teams? Better not to ask; she might actually know the answer.

So how does a Florida-based professional golfer, in 37th place in the Rolex Women's World Golf Rankings, come to be a fan of the Red Wings and hockey?

Her family hails from the Detroit area and as a young girl she'd spent a lot of summers there. She played quite a few rounds of golf with Kirk Maltby, a Red Wing from the glory era.

Her love of hockey is right there on her LPGA bio and Pressel is all smiles describing her younger days on the course with Maltby. There seems to be an affinity between hockey players and golf, she said.

Pressel was playing hockey trivia with The CJN following the second round of the Manulife Financial LPGA Classic at the Grey Silo Golf Course in Waterloo. She plays LPGA events pretty much every week, though her performance at Grey Silo had to be disappointing.

At the end of the weekend, Pressel had shot six under par – well back of winner Inbee Park, who scorched Grey Silo with a four round total of 23 under par, including a 10-under 61 in her final round.

Pressel finished the tournament tied for 45th, earning $5,921. Last year in the same event she shot 13 under par and finished tied in 26th place, earning twice as much.

To date this year, Pressel has had two top 10 finishes and she's won north of $205,000. Last year, she finished in the top 10 three times and earned more than $500,000, bringing her career earnings to more than $5 million.

Not bad at all, but you've got to go all the way back to 2007 for the highlight of her career, a victory in the Kraft Nabisco Championship, when at 18 she became the youngest player ever to win an LPGA major tournament.

Morgan Pressel

When you're that good, that young, it attracts attention and it no doubt helped her launch a charity golf event near and dear to her heart.

Having lost her mother, Kathryn Krickstein Pressel, to breast cancer when she was 15, Pressel now hosts the annual Morgan & Friends Fight Cancer charity tournament. Her golfing buddies, Paula Creamer, Lexi Thompson and Stacy Lewis, among others, participate, lending it credibility and glamour. This past January, the event raised $600,000 for breast cancer treatment.

While her trip to southern Ontario might be considered professionally disappointing, Pressel's got her share of fans north of the border. As she makes her way from fairway to green, a small but loyal group follows her around. It makes coming to Waterloo a little more special, she said.

"I like playing in Canada," she said. "It's a great time of year to be playing here."

Besides the group that follows her in Waterloo, she has found that young women and girls also look up to her.

"I try to be a good role model," she said. "I think I've grown up a lot being out here."

Turning pro at a young age, she never had the opportunity to play in the Maccabiah Games. "I wish I could have," she said.

In December 2011 she participated in a mission to Israel sponsored by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), accompanied by her sister and grandmother. "We toured, we had so much fun."

"The trip was great." ■

Hollande's stand against anti-Semitism impresses delegation

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Canadian participants in a meeting last week with French President Francois Hollande came away impressed with the French leader's sincerity and determination to address the terrorism and anti-Semitism that has France's Jews on edge.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler said Hollande was empathetic to the concerns of the country's Jews and was forthright in discussing the threat posed by French-born jihadists returning from Syria.

"Hollande spoke about the barbaric attack on the Jewish museum in Belgium" and about the protection of Jewish schools, synagogues and other community buildings, Cotler said in a telephone interview from Jerusalem.

Cotler and Benlolo were part of a 20-member delegation assembled by the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, which met with Hollande prior to officially inaugurating a historic exhibition at the UNESCO's Paris offices. The exhibit, mounted by historian Robert Wistrich, is titled, People, Book, Land: The 3,500 Year Relationship of the Jewish People to the Holy Land.

Canadian MP Irwin Cotler and senior officials of the Simon Wiesenthal Center were at the Elysee Palace in Paris last week to meet French President Francois Hollande. Seen here, from left, are Rabbi Marvin Hier, Rabbi Meyer May, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, Cotler and Avi Benlolo.

The exhibit was sponsored by the Simon Wiesenthal Center along with the governments of Canada, Israel, the United States and Montenegro, and launched last week after pressure from Arab countries forced its cancellation in January.

Benlolo said the reception by French officials and Hollande at the Élysée Palace was warm and welcoming. The delegates were anxious to express their concerns about the attack on the Jewish Museum in Brussels by a French gunman, who killed four people.

"Hollande believes there are more than 1,000 French nationals who went to fight in Syria and joined radical groups," Benlolo recounted. Three hundred remain. Many came back and he's concerned about their radicalization and if they will take action against the Jewish community.

Mehdi Nemmouche, the man accused in the Brussels attack, is believed to have spent 2013 fighting with Islamic radicals in Syria.

Hollande assured the delegates that he is working closely with intelligence and security services to track returning jihadists and to ensure the safety of the country's Jews.

"I believe Hollande was very sincere," Benlolo said.

"The Jewish community received substantial grants to secure their schools and synagogues," Benlolo added.

Cotler, who has visited France three times in the last six months, said "people spoke well of Hollande and his genuineness, his commitment to combat anti-Semitism, to bring perpetrators of anti-Semitism to justice and his appreciation of jihadist acts as threatening to French Jews and France alike. He took the position that it's a joint struggle, a part of the protection of French democracy and all of France."

During the meeting, Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Wiesenthal Center, told the president "we meet at a pivotal time in history, when the Jewish community and France's democratic

Jewish leaders reflect on death of Shoah denier Keegstra

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Holocaust denier Jim Keegstra, the first Canadian convicted under Canada's hate propaganda laws, was an "unrepentant anti-Semite" whose prosecution helped reveal a dark side of Canadian society, Jewish leaders said after his death became public last week.

The former Eckville, Alta., high school teacher, who made international headlines in 1983 when it came to light he was teaching his students that the Holocaust was a hoax promoted by Jews, died June 2 at age of 80. The Red Deer Advocate reported the news on June 12.

B'nai Brith Canada's national legal counsel, Marvin Kurz, who worked on the case under Mark Sandler, the Ontario legal counsel for the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, said Keegstra was the first "nationally known" Holocaust denier.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach at the the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said that "for more than a decade, Keegstra used his position as teacher to poison the minds of his students, teaching them that Jews were treacherous, subversive, and even child-killers.

"He taught his students that Jews were inherently evil and that they created the Holocaust in order to gain sympathy – and expected them to reflect these views in their classroom assignments," Rudner told The CJN in a statement.

Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, CIJA's predecessor, said Keegstra was "an unrepentant anti-Semite… who held a mirror to the consciousness of Canadians. He did us a favour by exposing a pretty ugly underbelly of Canada while concomitantly helping to solidify the fence of protection for vulnerable minorities, Canada's anti-hate laws. It was the Keegstra case that ended up before the Supreme Court of Canada, and in the end the decision to validate our anti-hate laws as constitutional."

In 1984, Keegstra was fired from teaching and charged with "wilfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group" under the Criminal Code of Canada.

Represented by Doug Christie, an attorney who would go on to defend many of Canada's other high-profile Holocaust deniers and neo-Nazis, Keegstra was convicted and given a fine of $5,000, which was later reduced to $3,000.

Len Rudner

> He taught his students that Jews were inherently evil.

Following a number of appeals and trials that lasted seven years and eventually brought the case to the Supreme Court of Canada, Keegstra received a one-year suspended sentence, one year of probation, and community service.

Kurz said that in the years since his conviction, Canadian society has come a long way in combating anti-Semitism.

"The kinds of things that Keegstra said are no longer, in Canada, said in polite company. You would no longer admit to this kind of thing, and there are very few people who do," Kurz said.

"His generation of anti-Semites and neo-Nazis are dying out and it highlights the movement toward a different kind of anti-Semitism that is more aimed at Israel and tying Jews to Israel's alleged criminality."

Rudner added that, "it is fitting that [Keegstra's] name will be remembered not for the noxious beliefs he espoused, but for the verification, from our highest court, that truly hateful speech is unworthy of our protection," Rudner said. ■

UJA Jewish Toronto Contingent Marches in NYC's 50th Annual Celebrate Israel Parade

By Daniel Horowitz

For the first time ever, a contingent from Jewish Toronto, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, joined more than 35,000 passionate supporters of the Jewish State in a march up Fifth Avenue in Manhattan on Sunday, June 1, in the 50th annual Celebrate Israel Parade.

Among those who took part in the Parade, which drew thousands of onlookers, were New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, Israeli diplomats and members of the Knesset, Israel's parliament.

Jewish Toronto's inaugural appearance at the Israel Day Parade – chaired by Judy Bronfman – was the brainchild of Andrea Cohen and David Matlow, the Chairs of United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2015. Matlow and Cohen suggested that Toronto have a presence in order to reach out to the many Torontonians living in New York, especially college students and young professionals.

Also, having a UJA Toronto contingent in the parade was a great way for Jewish Toronto to show its ongoing support for the people of Israel, especially in the wake of the May 25 UJA Walk with Israel, which attracted 20,000 participants.

Bronfman was accompanied in the parade by her children Alexandra and Andrew.

"We were completely overwhelmed by the response to our group in New York," said Bronfman. "People asked for our Canadian flags so they could wave them. Luckily, we brought extras. It was clear to us that Canada's support for Israel is well known in New York. While we were receiving the cheers they were really directed at all Canadian supporters of Israel."

UJA's Jewish Toronto contingent at New York City's Celebrate Israel Parade was led by Co-Chair of UJA's Campaign 2015, David Matlow (centre in baseball hat).

On registration, each participant received a Walk with Israel T shirt, Canadian and Israeli flags and a souvenir key chain. The key chain was generously donated by Danny Levinson of Lambertville, New Jersey and was sold by the East Side Torah Center as a fundraiser in the 1940s. The letter that accompanied the key chain, signed by Judy Bronfman, David and Andrea and Alison Himel, Chair of UJA Women's Philanthropy, stated the following:

"The East Side Torah Center was founded in 1890. In the 1940s, its fundraising campaign involved the sale of this keychain. In 2014, both the methods of fundraising and the needs of the Jewish community are much more complex. However, the objective of helping our fellow Jews in need remains the same. In Toronto, United Jewish Appeal is the organization that has the scope and breadth to help every person who is in need. UJA also has the capacity to fashion creative solutions to difficult social problems, as well as to conceive and implement unique experiences such as the one you are about to enjoy."

And enjoy, they did.

"Being involved in the UJA Campaign is not only meaningful, it is also fun," said Cohen. "We knew that the parade would be a great experience for the participants. Also, it shows that we in Toronto are part of the wider group known as the Jewish people. Not only does UJA raise money that transforms the lives of many members of the Jewish people, it marches in solidarity with it. That is what is significant about Toronto being in the parade. We are one with all people who care about the State of Israel and with helping our fellow Jews."

"For me, the highlight of the Parade was turning the corner from 54th Street where we waited, on to Fifth Avenue," said Matlow, whose New York-based daughter Naomi was a valuable volunteer in making Toronto's appearance a reality. "I looked north up the street and I saw group after group as far as you could see, all waving Israeli flags to the sound of Israeli music. Sometimes supporting Israel feels like a lonely business. Last month in Toronto at the Walk with Israel and this week in New York I saw how many people care about our homeland. It is inspiring to know that so many others care. Such support makes Israel strong, and we all need a strong Israel."

Panel probes whether Canadian Jews follow U.S. trends

plungen@thecjn.ca

In a survey of American Jews conducted by the Pew Research Center in 2013, 94 per cent said they were proud to be Jewish and 75 per cent said they had "a strong sense of belonging to the Jewish people."

At the same time, 22 per cent identified themselves as "Jews of no religion," a self identification that was more pronounced among younger people than older ones.

Pew published A Portrait of Jewish Americans in October 2013 based on telephone interviews with 3,475 American Jews earlier that year.

In a phone interview from Washington, Greg Smith, director of U.S. religion surveys in the religion and public policy project of the Pew Research Center, stressed that the data reflect the American situation, not necessarily the one in Canada.

"Jews overwhelmingly told us they were proud to be Jews and they have a strong connection to the Jewish community," Smith said.

The extent to which the U.S. experience is relevant to Canadian Jewry's future will be the subject of a panel discussion at the Elka Klein Memorial Lecture at Congregation Darchei Noam on June 23.

The panelists set to tackle the issues are Frank Bialystok, an instructor at the Centre for Canadian Studies at the University of Toronto; Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress; and Rabbi Aaron Levy, founder of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism. Smith will present the Pew's findings.

Meanwhile, communal organizations in Canada have commissioned their own reports, profiling the Jewish community nationally and on a city-by-city basis.

Local federations will release their community reports in the next few months, while UIA Canada will publish its national findings in the near future, said Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Federations Canada.

The reports will look at demographic trends, population growth and shrinkage, the aging population, Jewish poverty, immigration and other factors "that are useful for people planning services," she said.

Kislowicz said the Canadian data "will show some similarity [to that reported by Pew], but not at the same level or at the same pace."

Some of the U.S. data no doubt sent chills down the spines of community leaders and others concerned about the future of the Jewish people. Younger people were more likely than older ones to identify themselves as Jews of no religion. They are also less connected to Jewish community organizations, more likely to intermarry and less likely to raise their children as Jewish, compared to previous generations.

Among "millenials," those born after 1980, those identifying themselves as having no religion is as high as one-third, substantially more than Gen-Xers and far greater than found with Baby Boomers and the so-called Greatest Generation (born 1914-1927), said Smith.

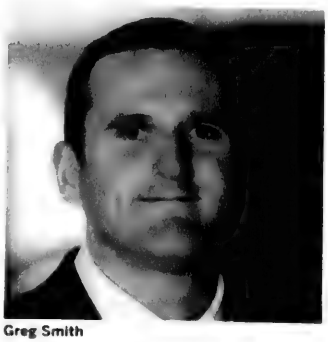
So what does it mean for Jews?

"On the one hand," said Smith, "we see that Jews of no religion are less engaged in the Jewish community" with lower rates of synagogue membership. They are less likely to donate to Jewish charities or support Jewish organizations. They're also more likely to intermarry and less likely to raise their children as Jewish.

On the other hand, Smith pointed out, the children of intermarried couples are more likely to identify as Jewish today than they would have been a generation ago.

"Among all U.S. adults with one Jewish parent [who are] older than 65, just 25 per cent are Jews." By contrast, 60 per cent of those under 30, with one Jewish parent today, are Jewish today, he said.

Defining what it means to be Jewish may well be a factor in the findings. "When we ask Jews what it means to them to be Jewish, religious aspects are not at the top of the list," Smith said.



Greg Smith

Pew's survey also notes that "Jews tend to be less religious than the U.S. public as a whole." Many say they can be Jewish even if they don't believe in God or if they work on the Sabbath. Leading an ethical and moral life was a common response to questions about their Jewish identity, he added.

Kislowicz said the Pew report was "conceptually relevant" to those studying the Canadian scene, but the two communities are not entirely alike.

"I think Canada is different. Our history is different, our affiliation is still more traditional," she said.

Whether Canada is trending along the same lines as Jews in the United States "is still a debate," she added. ■

French Jews, democratic values 'under attack'

values are under unprecedented attack by the forces of extremism both from the far right and from extreme Islamist purveyors of religious intolerance and murder."

He applauded Hollande and his predecessor, president Nicolas Sarkozy, for denouncing an earlier terrorist attack in Toulouse that claimed the life of a rabbi and four children. But he lamented the failure of Muslim religious leaders to condemn the attacks.

Meanwhile, Cotler was effusive in his description of the Wistrich exhibit, which he called "historic."

"It is a remarkable dramatization of history and heritage, of people, book, land, memory and state," he said.

In 24 panels, it traces Jewish history back to the patriarch Abraham, through Moses, King David and all the way through to the struggle for Soviet Jewry, the birth of Zionism and the reconstitution of the State of Israel.

The exhibit, which will run for nine days, had been scheduled to open last January. Pressure from 22 Arab countries, who argued it would prejudice the peace process, prompted UNESCO to cancel it.

Responding to that decision Rabbi Hier stated, "It is ironic, that while the Arab League was trying to kill this exhibition and all the attention was focused on Paris, the UN headquarters in New York is hosting an exhibit entitled, Palestine, based entirely on the Arab narrative, which was not criticized as an interference with Secretary [John] Kerry's mission."

Following public criticism from Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird and U.S envoy Samantha Power, the exhibit was rescheduled to open last week, but with the name "Israel" removed from the title and replaced with "Holy Land." UNESCO also required the removal of an image of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which had been part of the initial exhibit prepared by Wistrich, a professor of European and Jewish history at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. ■

JGH opposed to dying with dignity law

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@cjnews.ca

Montreal's Jewish General Hospital (JGH) "will explore all possibilities to opt out" of Bill 52, Quebec's end-of-life-care law which was adopted by the National Assembly on June 5, said executive director Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg.

He told a JGH-sponsored symposium on the so-called dying with dignity legislation held June 12 that the hospital will take an official position and "I can assure you it will not be apolitical."

Rosenberg blasted the government for apparently choosing the "expediency" of allowing medical intervention that results in death over addressing deficiencies in the health-care system, such as inadequate palliative care.

The legislation allows incurably ill adults capable of consent to request that a doctor administer a lethal injection.

"We do not give life, and we have no right to take life," Rosenberg affirmed. "The National Assembly has no bona fides to determine what is high-quality medical care and what is not."

He said he is not aware of a single doctor at the JGH who will comply with the law.

That position is at odds with the Quebec Medical Association which played a significant role in drawing up the bill and "welcomed" its passage. The law is not expected to be implemented for 18 months.

Rosenberg, a McGill University professor who was previously the JGH chief of surgical services, said the decision as to whether its doctors may assist gravely ill adults in ending their lives should be solely within the jurisdiction of health-care institutions' boards.

This "draconian" legislation sanctions "active euthanasia," he said. "It begs the question: Is this euthanasia law a pretext to provide an alternative solution to a problem [lack of proper end-of-life care] that either [the government] can't afford, doesn't know how or want to deal with?"

He noted that health care accounts for over half of Quebec's budget and the greatest costs are incurred at the end of life.

The vote was 94-22, with all the nays coming from Liberals. The sole Jewish MNA, Liberal David Birnbaum of D'Arcy McGee, voted for it with "a certain level of reticence and anxiety."

"I understand that there is no perfect answer morally speaking, nor an answer that eliminates completely the risk of unforeseen consequences," Birnbaum said in the legislature.

The day-long symposium for health-care professionals, lawyers and other interested parties began with the JGH's director of pastoral services, Rabbi Raphael Afilalo, saying that "thousands of people in Quebec will end up being killed every year," if the experience of the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg, where doctor-assisted suicide has been legal for more than a decade, is a guide.

The numbers of people dying this way has doubled over that period in Belgium to almost 4,200, he said. ■

Shuls grapple with same-sex unions

While gay marriage itself remains a sticking point for a lot of rabbis, there are many who nonetheless view the welcoming of LGBTQ Jews as both an ethical and practical imperative.

"If someone with an interest, commitment or curiosity about Jewish life knocks on our doors, we've got to let them in," Rabbi Splansky said.

"Some [rabbis] do it with full pleasure while others do it grudgingly, but everyone's got to do it... just looking at the numbers, we can't afford to lose anybody."

Her comment is in reference to the 2013 Pew report on American Jewry, a survey that indicates rising rates of secularism and intermarriage.

Perhaps for this reason as well, the modern Orthodox world has also seen a shift toward shelving views on homosexuality as sin and ushering LGBTQ Jews into the fold.

In 2010, close to 200 Orthodox rabbis signed a statement of principles regarding homosexual Jews.

Drafted by Rabbi Nathaniel Helfgot, a member of one of the largest organizations of Orthodox rabbis, the Rabbinical Council of America, it affirms that although same-sex unions are "antithetical to Jewish law," individuals with "homosexual inclinations should be treated with the care and concern appropriate to all human beings," including acceptance in synagogues.

It further acknowledges that homosexual Jews in the Orthodox community often face serious emotional and psychological challenges and that, especially among teenagers, the risk of suicide is greater.

Rabbi Aaron Levy, a modern Orthodox rabbi at Makom, a non-denominational, grassroots Jewish community congregation in downtown Toronto, won't perform gay marriages, but he said Makom is "a very queer-inclusive community," with a number of active LGBTQ members.

Last summer, Makom held a Shabbaton to honour the upcoming same-sex wedding of two members, which included an aufruf and learnings on queer issues and Judaism.

"In terms of where I am vis-a-vis my own approach to traditional Jewish law and my understanding of where the Orthodox community is in grappling with LGBTQ issues... I don't think I can perform a gay wedding," said Rabbi Levy.

Still, he noted, "Nature provides a minority of people whose sexuality is different, and Halachah has to, at some point, come up with a credible response... Even if communities aren't thinking as much about queer issues on the level of possible reinterpretations of Halachah, they're thinking about the social dynamic of becoming more welcoming."

Boston-based Rabbi Steve Greenberg has garnered recognition for being the only known, openly gay Orthodox rabbi, and one willing to officiate at same-sex Jewish weddings.

Author of Wrestling with God and Men: Homosexuality in the Jewish Tradition and executive director of Eshel, an American organization that functions as a national support network for LGBTQ Orthodox Jews who wish to remain committed to tradition, he has performed a same-sex, halachically observant wedding for a Toronto couple and will officiate at another one in Toronto in August.

"I do it because, being gay myself, I feel a responsibility for young people, that there should be some way to commit in a fashion that's real and that your family can celebrate," Rabbi Greenberg explained.

"But I think it's a mistake to presently expect [other] Orthodox rabbis to do this... it's premature to expect the Orthodox world to sanctify or celebrate what most in it still believe is a prohibition... I think it's sufficient to have Orthodox rabbis support a same-sex couple's Jewish life once they're married."

He emphasized that Orthodox rabbis have a responsibility not to dismiss LGBTQ individuals by telling them to pursue a heterosexual marriage or to opt for a life of celibacy.

Such responses, can, particularly for young people, cause extremely harmful outcomes, such as depression, self-harm or substance abuse, he said.

"This cannot be a process by which we throw arguments at each other. We need to take a human read of what it is to discover oneself to be gay, lesbian or transsexual and figure out if the community can find ways – either within halachic norms or within a sense of responsibility to shift them – to make way for people who aren't choosing their sexual or gender identity, but living it."

Rabbi Greenberg suggests that Orthodox rabbis can instead say things such as, "God is merciful. There are 612 mitzvot you can still try to do to the best of your ability... join my shul."

Aviva Goldberg is the ritual leader at Shir Libeynu, an unaffiliated, inclusive congregation that formed in the late 1990s in Toronto as a place for LGBTQ Jews to worship comfortably.

Raised in a modern Orthodox home, she turned to Reconstructionist Judaism as an adult and came out as a lesbian at age 38 (she's now 65).

Goldberg recalled how, two decades ago, even at a Reconstructionist synagogue, she and her partner weren't allowed to come up for an aliyah together to mark their anniversary.

While great strides have been made, she said, the community still has a way to go overall.

"Toronto's Jewish community is generally very conservative... I've heard some rabbis say, 'Anyone can come to our shul.' Sure, but do you talk about issues affecting LGBTQ members? Do any of your liturgies relate to them? Do you perform same-sex weddings? The answer is, of course, no. It's more like, 'You can come to our shul, but leave your life behind.'"

For some LGBTQ Jews, this perception sparks a rejection of "mainstream" synagogues in favour of wholly inclusive, non-denominational congregations like Shir Libeynu.

For others, like Wolpert, a more traditional synagogue that accepts LGBTQ congregants, but doesn't strictly define itself as a "gay shul" holds greater appeal.

"My gay identity is only one part of me. The rest of me also has to be satisfied by my religious home." ■

LGBTQ Jews need a place in community

RABBI STEVEN GREENBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

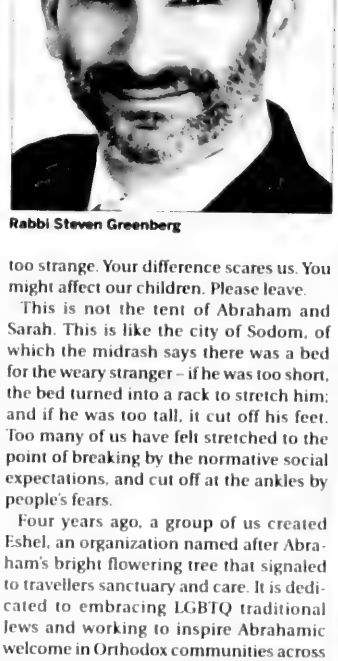
In 1952, my dad was a popular senior on his high school football team and my mother was a recent immigrant from war-torn France. It was my father's protective instinct that caused him to intervene one day to help a newly arrived French girl navigate their American high school, an instinct, among others, that eventually led to their marriage.

My mother was among 1,300 children who survived World War II in the French countryside, where, at great risk to themselves, three non-Jewish French families opened their doors to my mother after her father had been taken to Auschwitz and her mother could no longer protect her.

Over the years, it has become clear to me that the value of hachnasat orchim (welcoming the stranger) is an existential one for me personally. But I have also come to understand that it is an orchestrating value of Jewish identity.

Among all the many duties of kindness that Maimonides records, he deemed welcoming the stranger the most important. Such was the nature, he claims, of Abraham and Sarah, whose commitment to opening doors to the vulnerable stranger is embedded in our cultural DNA. Maimonides teaches that expressions of kindness – like dowering a poor bride, visiting the sick and burying the dead – are fulfilments of "love thy neighbor as thyself."

While in many liberal environments, acceptance is common, in Orthodox communities, lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender and queer (LGBTQ) people are terrified to speak honestly about their feelings. Many have been told by their religious authorities: you are not wanted. You cannot have aliyot, or lead services, or bring your children to the youth program, or join formally, or in some cases even walk through the door. You are just too strange. Your difference scares us. You might affect our children. Please leave.



Rabbi Steven Greenberg

This is not the tent of Abraham and Sarah. This is like the city of Sodom, of which the midrash says there was a bed for the weary stranger – if he was too short, the bed turned into a rack to stretch him; and if he was too tall, it cut off his feet. Too many of us have felt stretched to the point of breaking by the normative social expectations, and cut off at the ankles by people's fears.

Four years ago, a group of us created Eshel, an organization named after Abraham's bright flowering tree that signaled to travellers sanctuary and care. It is dedicated to embracing LGBTQ traditional Jews and working to inspire Abrahamic welcome in Orthodox communities across North America.

In the past several years, a new empathy has begun to transform Orthodox communities. Slowly and steadily, Orthodox LGBTQ individuals in their teens and 20s are choosing to be upfront and honest with their families and communities about their sexual orientation and gender expression. In so doing, they are changing the face of Orthodox Judaism. Some of us are finding committed partnerships, making families and seeking Orthodox communities where we can be members. This is challenging religious leaders and their congregations to navigate halachic considerations and group fears that can make any difference feel too risky to embrace.

My great-grandmother on my father's side did just that in the 1940s. Hannah Greenberg and Grandpa Max left Romania in 1923, settled first in Winnipeg and then moved to McKees Rocks, Pa., where they joined the little Orthodox shul. A few years later, Hannah joined the board and, as the family story goes, when a poor man, Mr. Rive, reputed to be a Communist, could not pay his dues the board decided to bar him from attendance on the High Holidays. Hannah would have none of it. "If there's no room for Mr. Rive," she announced, "then there's no room for me."

The next week she founded what was lovingly called "The Rebel Shul." She bought two Torahs with her own money and ran the minyan for seven years, baking rugelach and serving matches herring to lure the men to shul on time.

These are the values that mark true faith and piety. No one is locked out, stripped of membership. No one is asked to leave due to irrational fear, political liability or social discomfort.

Right now, LGBTQ teenagers in your community are wondering whether there will be a place for them. There are presently a few – at most a dozen – Orthodox shuls in the world where LGBTQ people and their families have been fully embraced. In the next five years, Eshel is aiming to help generate 36 "Rebel Shuls" across North America where young LGBTQ Orthodox Jews can imagine a good life lived in community. It may not be easy, but the ethic of fearless welcome that made heaven swoon for Abraham and Sarah is also life saving for the vulnerable, and defining of our very nature. ■

Rabbi Steven Greenberg is author of Wrestling with God and Men: Homosexuality in the Jewish Tradition, and the founder and co-director of Eshel, an Orthodox LGBT community support and education organization. Steve lives with his partner Steven Goldstein and his daughter Amalia in Boston.

The Jewish Community take their celebrations seriously.

WHY THE SYSTEM WORKS, WHEN IT DOESN'T AND WHO'S TO BLAME

Family Matters

John Syrtash

B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

Sisyphus is a figure of Greek mythology who was condemned to repeat forever the same meaningless task of pushing a boulder up a mountain, only to see it roll down again

A spouse who seeks justice from Ontario's Family Courts often feels like Sisyphus, except at least the Greek hero did not have to cash in an RRSP to pay any legal fees to roll up that bolder. The Judges are not at fault. They work very hard for a system that is overtaxed, often with people that come to them with or without legal representation. They also work without the assistance of a sufficient number of other Family Law judges to share the caseload, an issue the federal and provincial governments must address.

So Sisyphus just keeps pushing that boulder when a competent lawyer might have dissuaded him not to bother; or to have settled; or to have driven up the mountain instead with the expert knowledge he doesn't have. Many simply can't afford any lawyer and don't qualify for legal aid. They don't have a choice and cannot be criticized. But certain others would rather buy a nicer looking car or spend their money on a vacation or improve their home then to spend part of their income on experienced counsel. They would rather waste the Court's time. These "certain others" help bottle up the system. They prevent those responsible people who want to resolve their disputes from having their cases heard. A knowledgeable lawyer may have settled or shortened a hearing or abandoned issues that he/she knows will be a loser: but not the Sisyphus who is self-represented. He just keeps rolling that bolder and all those Sisyphuses lower down the mountain are left waiting, even though they may be well represented. This is the hidden problem that Judges cannot talk about. They strain to assist unrepresented litigants during motions and trials, people who usually don't know a thing about procedure or the law. Such spouses often account for much of the delay inherent the family court system, but since everyone has a right to be heard, with or without counsel, everyone suffers.

Another reason that this bolder keeps rolling is the way in which issues are resolved under the Court's rules. These "family law rules" were designed to ensure that people and their lawyers talk about their conflicts to Judges directly before they do battle so that the Court can help resolve a conflict without necessarily imposing a ruling, usually at a much greater cost. So before one can fight it out at a "motion" or "trial" a spouse must attend a series of "conferences" before a Judge, and present the issues through written briefs and discussion. If there is a true emergency, one can dispense with the Conference and ask the Court simply to make an emergency ruling or call an Emergency Case Conference.

In my experience the Conference system and these rules usually work. They have not only been successful, but have generally served as a model for other jurisdictions. Many excellent judges and lawyers over the years have resolved innumerable difficult cases and disputes without the necessity of bringing the matters before a different Judge for a formal decision, such as a motion or trial, saving both parties a lot more money. However, the system breaks down with some people who manipulate it by causing needless delays for a variety of reasons, particularly when delay serves their interests.

Delay can lead to "litigation fatigue" and sometimes it is intentional or tactically planned in the hope of wearing down a spouse to promote an easier settlement or in the hope that the other spouse will simply walk away. I have been involved in cases where a spouse will pay a lawyer just to have my client keep pushing that bolder long enough that he or she will give up pushing. Accordingly, some people intentionally fail to provide sufficient disclosure of their financial documents or information in a timely fashion, forcing opposing counsel to bring proceedings to oblige their cooperation, but at a heavy cost. The spouse who requires such information then suffers endless months of delay. Other times a parent with the care of a child since separation will intentionally delay proceedings long enough to ensure that his/her child is so alienated from the other parent that it will no longer matter anymore what a judge rules at trial about parenting decisions or where the child should reside. A trial judge cannot easily change what a child feels, thinks or does, particularly after a certain age.

Then there are those lawyers with scheduling conflicts that make them so busy that they can't agree to an early Conference date. However, when one of their clients requires urgent attention a very few number of these lawyers suddenly manage to somehow "free up" the time they didn't have before by appointing agents or even showing up themselves. I'm always amazed to see this sudden transformation. It's as if a traffic jam stops the bolder from rolling and then a Tomahawk helicopter magically appears to lift it into the sky and up the mountain. Amazing.

So yes, the system usually works. But there are hidden problems. I've just mentioned a few. The challenge is to fix them.

The potential of lawful, democratic processes

A. Alan Borovoy

My recently-published memoir, At the Barricades, relates how a Jewish kid from downtown Toronto became a professional agitator for human rights and civil liberties. The memoir illustrates the potential of lawful, democratic processes to achieve social reform. It is one man's answer to the defenders of violent and unlawful tactics.

Early on, for example, my colleagues and I organized a large, representative delegation that met with the then- premier of Ontario, to urge a legislative prohibition against racial discrimination in housing. Our delegation included all the major churches, unions, ethnic groups, and even three municipal councils. The Ontario government overcame its traditional resistance to such measures and moved almost immediately to enact our proposed changes. In the wake of rallies we organized – several hundred strong – the federal government amended a bill on national security and Parliament declined to resurrect the death penalty. All perfectly legal.

We also developed some novel tactics. At one point, we considered how to deal with a federal pornography bill that threatened to jail librarians for disseminating certain legitimate literature. At our urging, there was a one-day closing of all but four Toronto libraries. The event was a media sensation – and a lawful one. The bill was withdrawn soon afterwards.

Earlier, we went door-to-door asking parents from a North York public school to exempt their kids from the official Christian instruction that was being conducted there and elsewhere. We gathered exemption requests for more than 400 pupils at that school. Our action effectively paralyzed the program, prompting officials of the school board to seek a meeting with my organization. That precipitated a number of changes in board policy and ultimately the withdrawal of the program from all North York schools.

In conjunction with other measures we adopted (including a court challenge), the religious education program was finally eliminated from the Ontario public school system. Significantly, our tactics were all lawful.

Unavoidably, there was also unpleasantness. Such was my experience with the free speech claims of Holocaust denier, Ernst Zundel, and anti-Semitic teacher James Keegstra. Both were prosecuted under laws that could nail not only them but also democratic dissenters. So, we at the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA), undertook a campaign against those laws. Regrettably, this provoked tensions with elements of the Jewish community.

At the Barricades* by A. Alan Borovoy

But we were ever on the look-out for principled ways to dramatize the conflicts between the hate mongers and CCLA. Shortly after the Zundel trial ended, I was on a radio program, discussing the CCLA objections to the prosecution. Suddenly, the moderator announced that Zundel himself was on the phone. Upon taking the microphone, I simply said that, while I might feel obliged to defend Zundel's legal rights, I had no comparable obligation to treat him with respect. Thereupon, we pulled the plug and the interview ended. Thus we were able to rebuke both the prosecution and Zundel.

My memoir opens with a description of early influences on me: the liberalism and humour in my family, the frequent brushes with anti-Semitism, the tribulations of a childhood friend who had polio, the insensitivity and even idiocy of certain educators, and the financial insecurity of many around me.

My memoir closes with some advice (possibly gratuitous) to those activists who succeed me. The beginning of wisdom, I say to them, is the recognition that, whatever we humans do, it's likely to turn out badly. So, even if we can't make the situation good, we can make it less bad. We should aim, therefore, not to create heaven on earth, but rather to reduce the hell.

Nevertheless, I conclude, it's necessary to have fun. Those who miss the humour in our work will likely develop a bad digestive system. And that could mean pimples. ■

Hitchhiking the norm for many in Israel

JESSICA STEINBERG
TIMES OF ISRAEL

The sun was blazing down when Avi Kohn was waiting for a ride.

Standing at the side of Route 60, often known as the Tunnels Road for the two tunnels at the Jerusalem end of the highway (which runs north-south to the Etzion Bloc settlements, Bethlehem and Hebron), Kohn was tremping, hitchhiking, home to Efrat.

"My wife has the car today," he said. "So here I am."

There he stood, dressed in a pinstriped, button-down shirt, tucked neatly into navy chinos, a middle-aged man incongruously sticking out his hand, looking for a free ride.

He was joined intermittently by others looking for a tremp as well.

Every few minutes another car would stop. Sometimes it was driven by a neighbour, or by someone else the hitchhikers, or trempistim, knew personally. But those looking for rides also got into cars driven by strangers, certain kinds of strangers. The men usually had large, knit yarmulkes on their heads; the women covered their hair as well, with hats or scarves. Even the cars had a certain look: large minivans or small sedans, often banged up, and sporting yellow Israeli license plates.

"You can recognize when it's the right kind of driver," Kohn said. "My 17-year-old daughter tremps all over the place. But she's careful."

With a vast manhunt under way since early last Friday as police and the army search for the three teenage boys abducted late last Thursday night, the subject of hitchhiking is on everyone's minds. The three boys were tremping home from their schools in the West Bank, as is customary. It's a cheaper and often more convenient way of getting around than the less frequent public buses.

"I was an hour behind them on Thursday night," said S., an 18-year-old high school senior who was sitting on a bench next to the Route 60 trempiyada.

S. lives in Jerusalem but attends an all-boys school in Kiryat Arba, a settlement next to Hebron. His parents would prefer that he only take the bus, and have even offered to pay for a private cab, but that's not an option, he said, even though his parents can afford it.

"It's just not normal to take a cab. No one does that," he said. "If you're right-wing or an extremist, you take a tremp. Tremping is the norm."

OPINION

World Cup fever is upon us again

Yair Lootstein

Although we're much better at sports such as judo and sailing – and even team sports such as basketball – soccer is undeniably the most popular game in Israel. I've never quite understood why.

We have a mediocre 14-team upper tier division called the Winner League, followed by several lower divisions. The handful of truly talented Israeli players are continually being plucked by more successful and far wealthier European teams, leaving the local soccer scene in general decline.

There is, however, a ray of hope, and surprisingly, it's made its way to Israel from Canada in the form of Torontonian Mitch Goldhar. In 2009, Goldhar bought Maccabi Tel Aviv's soccer team and ever since, he's been fixated on bringing a more professional style of soccer management (as well as much-needed funds) to that club, something that has not been universally appreciated by others in the soccer "industry" here in Israel. With his watchful eye and open wallet, Maccabi Tel Aviv won the national championships in both 2013 and 2014, and with no real challengers on the horizon, an Israeli soccer dynasty might be in place.

In the absence of a calamity that doomsday seers are predicting for Brazil, by the time this piece is published, we should be a week or so into the World Cup. In Israel, we call it the Mondial. Every four years, the world's top national soccer teams come together for a true festival of football – a month-long competition leading one of them to the coveted World Cup trophy. Literally billions watch the games around the globe – more than the Olympics.

We've been waiting for this year's tournament ever since Spanish midfielder Andrés Iniesta scored the only goal in the final of the previous Mondial, in Johannesburg in 2010, to beat my favourite – the Netherlands – just four minutes before the end of overtime, giving Spain its first-ever championship.

Preparations for the qualifying rounds of this World Cup began not long after the climax of the South African games, and in Israel, we hoped against hope that our national team would finally make it to the tournament, something that has happened only once, in 1970, in Mexico City, where our side was led by striker Mordechai (Motaleh) Spiegler and where we even managed two ties and a goal (against Sweden) before bowing out of the preliminary round.

Our hopes were once again frustrated. Israel finished third in its qualifying round group of six, behind Russia and Portugal, better teams that both made it through to Brazil. That might not seem too awful, given Israel's current FIFA ranking of 75th in the world, but many here in Israel were very disappointed.

Despite Israel's lackluster performance, Mondial fever is upon us. Sales of huge flat-screen TVs have spiked. Restaurants and bars have prepared special events throughout the month. Some homes are festooned with the flags of favourite national teams. People have changed their work and holiday schedules enabling them to watch games, most of which will be broadcast in the middle of the night here in Israel, seven time zones ahead of Brazil.

And speaking of those broadcasts nearly all the games will be aired on Channel One of the Israel Broadcast Authority (IBA), our equivalent of CBC or TVO. That same IBA is currently threatened with closure because of decades of financial mismanagement, and its employees have been executing all sorts of labour-related actions. Some even mistakenly schemed to cancel broadcasts of World Cup games, until their union leadership realized that doing so would backfire, bringing the ire of millions of Israelis upon them.

I'm rooting for the Netherlands again in Brazil, but maybe by 2018, when the next World Cup is held in Russia, Israel will finally find a place among the Mondial finalists. And perhaps Goldhar or someone like him could help Israel bring that dream to fruition. Amen! ■

Netanyahu seeks PA help

IDF soldiers search for three missing teens in Hebron. ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu spoke with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas seeking his assistance in the return of three teens, believed to have been kidnapped by Hamas.

Monday's conversation was the first between the two leaders in more than a year. Following the conversation, Abbas released a statement condemning the kidnapping, his first such statement, according to Ha'aretz.

"I expect you to assist in returning the abducted youths and in apprehending the kidnappers. The Hamas kidnappers came from territory under Palestinian Authority control and returned to territory under Palestinian Authority control," Netanyahu told Abbas, according to a statement released by the Prime Minister's Office. "This incident exposes the true face of the terrorism that we are fighting against. Terrorists abduct innocent Israeli children while we save the lives of ill Palestinian children in our hospitals. This is the difference between our humanitarian policy and the murderous terrorism that is attacking us."

Netanyahu added, according to the statement: "The consequences of the partnership with Hamas must be understood; it is bad for Israel, bad for the Palestinians and bad for the region."

The three Israeli teens, including one dual Israeli-American citizen, have been missing since the night of June 12. Eyal Yifrach, Gilad Sha'ar, and Naftali Frenkel were last seen trying to get rides home from a yeshiva high school in Gush Etzion, a group of settlements located south of Jerusalem.

In a statement given to the official Palestinian news agency, Wafa, Abbas "condemned the latest escalations in the West Bank, including the kidnapping of three Israeli settlers and the ongoing series of violations by Israeli soldiers and settlers, against innocent Palestinian civilians and against prisoners held in Israeli jails."

The statement called on all sides to refrain from violence, and restated Abbas' position "to continue with the extensive efforts to ensure the release of Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails when a final peace deal with Israel is signed."

Also Monday, the Israel Defence Forces' spokesperson's unit called on the Israeli public to "behave responsibly and not take part in the promotion of unsubstantiated rumours" on social media including Facebook and Twitter.

The IDF also confirmed Monday that Israeli soldiers shot and killed a Palestinian the previous day near Ramallah after the troops came under attack from Palestinian rioters during a raid of a Hamas target.

The Palestinian was killed as he attempted to throw a brick at Israeli soldiers, according to the IDF.

The International Red Cross on Sunday night called for the "immediate and unconditional release" of the three Israeli teens.

"We are very concerned by the fate of the teenagers. International humanitarian law prohibits abduction as well as the taking of hostages," said Robert Mardini, head of ICRC operations in the Middle East. "They must be treated humanely, and their lives and dignity protected and respected."

In a statement, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird condemned the kidnappings.

"We call for the immediate release of the three Israeli teenagers. Whoever has taken this action must be found and brought to justice," he said.

"We urge the Palestinian security authorities, who have been trained through Canadian and U.S. leadership, to make every effort to investigate this incident and work diligently to ensure the safe return of these children to their families."

'Trempistim' unafraid

He said he knows how to identify a safe driver or fellow hitchhiker. They look like him, he said, pointing to his jeans, polo shirt and kippah.

He's right, in a sense. Tremping has long been a phenomenon of the Israeli collective, said Prof. Gad Yair, a sociologist at Hebrew University.

"Hitchhiking represented the concept that all of Israel is unified," said Yair, "that everyone tremps, that we're one big kibbutz, that we're in this together."

Taking rides with strangers was considered acceptable by many until the first intifadah in 1987 and a spate of abductions, including that of Nachshon Wachsman, who was abducted by a car of Hamas militants wearing yarmulkes and playing chassidic music.

After Wachsman was killed by his Hamas captors during a failed rescue attempt, the IDF forbade soldiers from hitchhiking. It regularly sends out undercover military police units in unmarked cars to pick up soldiers who hitch, sending them to military jail for violating the order.

But two other populations have continued to hitchhike, the national religious settlers and the ultra-Orthodox.

The ultra-Orthodox tend to tremp for financial reasons, Yair said. The national religious, however, hitchhike as a statement of ownership.

"They're saying, 'It's our state and no one will stop us or scare us,'" he said. "It's a guerrilla stance."

Maayan Sivillya, 22, was waiting in the shade of the trempiyada. Dressed in a sleeveless white blouse tucked into jeans, an artful tattoo inked on her shoulder, she did not look like the other religious young women waiting at the bus stop.

Now living in Hazeva, a community in the south, Sivillya was trying to get home to her parents' house, in Kiryat Arba. "I tremp all the time," she said.

For Sivillya, it's a matter of practicality. There are no buses from Be'er Sheva to Hazeva. Once she makes it here, to Route 60, the Egged buses are often full.

"For me, it's more the issue of men; I prefer to ride with women," she said. "But this is how we grew up out here, we tremped."

"A Tel Aviv guy is going to wait for a bus," S. said. "But people who live out here are stronger, they're used to it. They grew up in this environment, and tremping is how they get where they need to go." ■

Thousands pray for teens at Kotel

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry also called for the immediate release of the teens and noted the "many indications" pointing to Hamas' involvement.

In a statement Sunday, more than 48 hours after the teens' abduction, Kerry said he "strongly condemns" the kidnapping and reiterated that Hamas is a "terrorist organization."

Kerry said U.S. officials "continue to offer our full support for Israel in its search for the missing teens, and we have encouraged full co-operation between the Israeli and Palestinian security services." Along with calling for their immediate release, he said the United States hopes for "their quick and safe return home."

He said the U.S. continues to "seek details on the parties responsible for this despicable terrorist act, although many indications point to Hamas' involvement."

"We reiterate our position that Hamas is a terrorist organization known for its attacks on innocent civilians and which has used kidnapping in the past," Kerry said.

On Sunday, thousands gathered at the Kotel to pray for the teens' safe return.

More than 25,000 people attended the Sunday evening service led by Chief Rabbi David Lau. Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Yosef also was at the service, as were members of the Chief Rabbinate council and MKs.

"We prove to our enemies that the nation of Israel is alive and will never be broken," Rabbi Lau said at the service. "Everyone gathered here at the Kotel as one, with one heart, unified in a prayer for the safety of the kidnapped, that they will be swiftly returned to their families."

A Facebook page dedicated to the return of the teens, Bring Back Our Boys, has garnered more than 64,600 likes since its establishment on Friday.

Talmud scholar Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, founder of the yeshiva attended by two of the three teens, called on Jews to recite psalms, and pray for their safe return.

In Canada, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said, "the entire Jewish community [is] praying for the rescue and safe return of the boys."

Added co-chair Rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl: "Our concern now is with reuniting the boys with their families. We invite members of the Jewish community, other religious communities, and people of goodwill everywhere to join us in prayer to support those who are living through this traumatic ordeal." ■

Classically trained singer stars at Toronto Jazz Festival

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto jazz singer Lara Solnicki could have become the next Beverly Sills, but instead is carving her own path as a jazz artist.

Once a Verdian soprano, Solnicki will showcase songs from her recent CD Whose Shadow? at the Toronto Jazz Festival June 21 in a one-hour concert at Lula Lounge.

An accomplished composer and poet with a four octave range, Solnicki gave up an opportunity to sing Madame Butterfly and a career in opera to develop her creativity in poetry and jazz over the last eight years.

"When I was at the Royal Conservatory of Music, I initially thought opera would be my career. But I ultimately decided I wanted to immerse myself in creative music, improvisation and writing poetry and found my home in contemporary jazz ," said Solnicki.

Thus far, Solnicki has received acclaim for both Whose Shadow? and her debut 2010 CD A Meadow In December, a selection of songs from the Great American Songbook of jazz standards that have been played on jazz radio stations across Canada.

In Whose Shadow?, Solnicki shows her flair for composing and drawing from her classical music training in many songs. In the song La Flute Enchanté, she combines a classical flute styling with her jazz arrangements while singing in French.

She draws inspiration from artists such as Peter Gabriel and Joni Mitchell interpreting what she describes as "art pop songs."

"I love the playfulness of jazz and the poetry of words in these songs."

Along with her artistic talent, Solnicki has a business flair that has made her widely known in jazz circles across Canada.

She has recorded with multiple award jazz instrumentalists and producers despite not being signed on a major record label and having no agent.

Solnicki may have drawn inspiration from her family. Born in Toronto, her parents, filmmaker Victor Solnicki and author Jill Solnicki gave her both the love of the cultural arts as well as the self-discipline to succeed in her career. ■

Jazz composer/singer Lara Solnicki performs June 20, 7:30 p.m. for the Toronto Jazz Festival at Lula Lounge, 1585 Dundas St. W. in Toronto. Admission is free. For further information, call 416-588-0307 or go to www.lula.ca

CBC Radio winner will also play at renowned festival

Ori Dagan plays at the TD Toronto Jazz Festival on several days:

• A tribute to Cole Porter, featuring the Ori Dagan Quintet with trumpet player Brownman, at the May Cafe, June 20 at 9 p.m. • With bassist Dave Young at Pauper's Pub, June 26, at 7 p.m. • With guitarist Eric St-Laurent at Habits Gastropub, June 27, at 9 p.m. • A trio with pianist Scott Metcalf and special guests at La Revolucion, June 28, at 9 p.m.

Top jazz singer 'loves being himself'

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jazz singer Ori Dagan says he never thought of himself as a crooner until he won a CBC Radio 1 competition that named him "Canada's Next Top Crooner."

He was surprised when he won the 2010 competition in which contestants were asked to take an '80s pop tune and make it a crooner song. Dagan chose to sing Madonna's Like A Virgin for the competition because it's "hilarious," he said. "I wasn't trying to win. I was being myself."

Being himself means being musically adventurous, a trait that's evident on his latest, and sophomore, recording, Less Than Three. On it, he covers songs by Elvis Presley, Elton John and Lady Gaga. "I wanted to challenge myself," Dagan said.

Dagan is more than a crooner. He's known for his scatting ability, and his repertoire includes rock 'n' roll and Hebrew songs. "I consider myself a jazz singer, but I draw from a wide range of influences," said Dagan, who was born in Haifa and raised in Toronto.

Voted NOW Magazine's 2013 best male vocalist, Dagan has come a long way. As a child he was afraid to speak in class, never mind to sing in public. But he always gravitated to music, he said, as had his musical ancestor, his mother's grandfather, who was a cantor. When Dagan was four years old, he started taking classical piano lessons and he stuck with the piano, unhappily, for some 12 years.

"I showed promise, but I wasn't passionate about classical music," he said. At 18, he enrolled in the English program at the University of Toronto and writing poetry became his creative outlet. It was around that time he was blown away by Ella Fitzgerald's version of How High the Moon, which includes a seven-minute scat performance. "When I first heard it, I said, 'I have to sing along with it.' I literally listened to it 10,000 times," said Dagan, describing how he taught himself the basics of scatting.

Immersing himself in jazz, he found the freedom intoxicating, he said. Just the idea of improvising thrilled him. "What bothered me about classical music is that it was always the same," Dagan said. "Ella would do a song differently from night to night and recording to recording. I found that cool."

Dagan enrolled in the jazz program at York University, but a professor told him he needed to do some extra work on his voice. The prof suggested that Dagan – a bass-baritone, a rare type of classical voice – transfer to a baroque music program to improve his singing. So Dagan took a detour back to classical music. Then he returned to the music he loved, enrolling in the jazz program at Humber College.

It was between York U. and Humber, in 2009, that he released his debut recording of jazz standards, S'cat Got My Tongue. Three years later, with the release of the edgier Less Than Three, the critics declared Dagan had hit a home run.

It includes the Hebrew songs, Eretz Zavat Chalav, by Eliyahu Gamliel, and Dagan's self-penned prayer to peace, a blues song called Nu Az Ma?. He said he was thinking about the situation in the Mideast when he wrote the song, but it also applies generally.

He added that when he began experimenting with singing in Hebrew, he "felt strongly connected to it," although he doesn't come from a religious home. Recently, Dagan learned some of Arieh (Arik) Einstein's songs for a tribute to Einstein – a pioneer of Israeli rock music – during Jewish Music Week.

Dagan said that "as a singer you have to be naked and vulnerable, and even more so when you're singing your own song."

He enjoys recording, but he said that his favourite thing is to perform for an audience. "My hope with an audience is to give them something they've never heard before."

Dagan performs at the upcoming TD Toronto Jazz Festival and in late June he leaves for a tour of Israel. For more information about Dagan and the tour, visitoridagan.com. ■

Cousins' musical debuts at Fringe

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Cousins Evan and Rafe Malach have created A Simple Twist of Faith, a folk-rock musical that will debut at the Kiever Shul in Kensington Market this summer at the Toronto Fringe Festival.

The play is set during World War I at a synagogue in Germany. As the chazzan chants a prayer to welcome the Sabbath, an Allied soldier wanders into the sanctuary causing quite a stir among the worshippers.

Alex Lurye, played by Adam Jesin, is an American Jew, who has been traumatized by the war and is desperate to make a spiritual connection. He is befriended by Evan Malach's character, Herr Rosenau, a local Jewish congregant, who invites the soldier to his home for Shabbat.

The ensuing plot, which is inspired by a true story, revolves around the lives of these two Jewish men. Alex returns to America, marries and starts a family. His business survives the Depression, but in Nazi-run Germany, the outlook for Herr Rosenau and his family is grim.

One of the most unusual aspects of A Simple Twist of Faith is the venue of the performance. The scene in the German synagogue is performed in the sanctuary of the Kiever, where one of the shul's two chazzanim Pinchus Gutter and Menashe Solomon will take turns participating in the musical by reciting prayers from the bimah.

The three acts of the production take place in different locales of the synagogue. A mysterious fiddler played by violinist Sonia Shklarov will lead the audience to the various settings as the story progresses. Naomi Tessler is directing the production.

Malach, 29, a regular at the Kiever, says he thought the shul would lend itself well to a theatrical production. "I'd been trying to do a site specific musical."

When he went on a heritage retreat in Montana last summer, he heard the story of Alex and Herr Rosenau. "It stuck with me."

In the fall, he teamed up with his cousin, now a lawyer, to write the songs for A Simple Twist of Faith. "Evan had the idea for the show," says Rafe, also 29. "The musical was a big endeavour, but I convinced him to go forward. I thought it was a great idea and I was really excited to do the project with him."

Evan Malach wears several professional hats. Not only is he a singer/songwriter and actor, but he is the program co-ordinator of arts and culture at JUMP (Jewish Urban Meeting Place) and he is also studying to be a cantor.

He graduated with a music and history degree from McGill University. He co-wrote an earlier rock musical, In Adequacy, which was presented at the 2007 Toronto Fringe Festival. He went on to study acting in New York City and later released two CDs – What Still Could Be and Along the Endless Highway.

He is also 2012 winner of the Hallelujah Global Jewish Singing Contest.

A Simple Twist of Faith is the inaugural production of HOW (Harmony Over War). Evan created HOW, which is connected to the 100th anniversary of World War I, to promote an anti-war message.

He points out that the assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, which set off World War I, took place on June 28, 1914. "It's important for Jews to remember this history. Music and culture and theatrical stories is a great way to do that." ■

A Simple Twist of Faith will be presented 12 times during the Fringe Festival, which runs from July 2 to July 13. For performance times and a list of other events visit fringetoronto.com

MASTERPIECES OF POLISH CINEMA ON VIEW AT TIFF BELL LIGHTBOX

A presentation of Masterpieces of Polish Cinema at the TIFF Bell Lightbox includes several films of special interest.

Austeria, directed by Jerzy Kawalerowicz, is a cinematic treatment of Julian Stryjkowski's novel, about a day in a Galician country inn – the first day of World War I– as the Jewish proprietor meets assorted townspeople fleeing the approaching Russian army.

The Promised Land, directed by Andrzej Wajda, from the 1898 novel by Wladyslaw Reymont, focuses on the booming industrial city of Lodz and three friends who start a textile factory together.

The Hourglass Sanatorium, adapted by director Wojciech Has from the short stories of Bruno Schulz, is about a young man seeking his father at a dilapidated asylum; he experiences a weird labyrinth, hallucinatory visions and ghostly remnants of Poland's vanished Jewish world.

Screenings continue to July 1. tiff.net

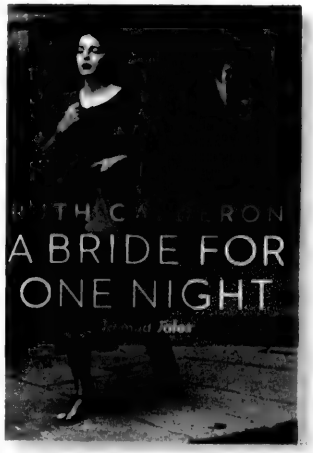
Talmud stories from an unusual point of view

MARTY LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



A Bride for a Night: Talmud Tales
Ruth Calderon, translated by Ilana Kurshan

Jewish Publication Society

Since 2013 when she was elected to the Knesset as a member of Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid party, Ruth Calderon has become famous throughout Israel. But for 25 years before that, she was well known as a creative force in Jewish education in Israel and, to a lesser extent, outside of Israel.

She has founded two innovative study centres for adults: Elul in Jerusalem, a beit midrash (house of study, a term generally connoting a yeshiva or other traditional religious institution) where secular Jewish men and women study traditional Jewish texts together; and Alma in Tel Aviv, another study centre where such text study is combined with the creative arts and cultural activities.

Years before her political life began, Calderon, who has a PhD in Talmud from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, published a Hebrew book combining creative and scholarly readings of rabbinic stories. The book has now been released in a first-rate English translation by Ilana Kurshan, under the title A Bride for a Night: Talmud Tales.

The book's 17 chapters all have the same three-part structure: the text in English of a very short story, usually less than one page long, found in the Talmud or in another collection of rabbinic texts; a creative retelling of the story; and a short analysis of the story's significance and meaning.

The unique part is Calderon's creative retelling. For example, after she presents the talmudic story from Kiddushin 40a about a rich Roman woman propositioning Rabbi Zadok (first century), she retells it in the first-person voice of the woman. Another story originates in Rashi's Talmud commentary to Avodah Zarah 18b. In it, Rabbi Meir (second century) urges one of his students to try to seduce Rabbi Meir's own brilliant and learned wife, Beruriah, in order to teach her a lesson. Calderon retells this disturbing story in the first-person voice of the student. Readers who are used to traditional ways of studying Talmud might find these retellings jarring, but they help to bring the stories and their characters to life in a new way.

> Calderon's worldview is unabashedly modern, feminist and egalitarian

Calderon's worldview is unabashedly modern, feminist and egalitarian, and the talmudic stories generally are not. Yet her explanations, most of which centre around women, are impressive and sometimes surprising. One example follows: the little-known story (Yalkut Shimoni Proverbs 18) about the wedding night of the son of Rabbi Akiva (second century).

"What did he do? When he brought his wife home he stayed up all night reading the Torah portion. He said to his wife: 'Hold a lamp and illuminate my page.' She held a lamp and stood before him. She illuminated his page until morning came."

After movingly retelling this story in the first-person voice of the bride who had had different expectations for her wedding night, Calderon addresses the question of what this strange story means. She admits it is possible for modern readers to read it as the story of an unfeeling husband who ignores his wife's needs and desires even on their wedding night. She, however, offers a different explanation.

She reminds her readers of the famous talmudic story (Ketubbot 63a) about the groom's father, Rabbi Akiva, who was an ignoramus until he married but then, with his wife's permission, went off to study at an out-of-town yeshiva. He returned home only 24 years later and was then a renowned scholar with 24,000 disciples.

The saga of Rabbi Akiva and his wife is often presented as a story of the true love of a long-separated husband and wife. After all, the Talmud reports that Rabbi Akiva told his disciples that all his accomplishments and all their accomplishments in Torah study were to be attributed to her. They had married, according to the Talmud, against her father's wishes, because she saw and admired his positive character traits. Later in life, Rabbi Akiva lavished expensive gifts on his wife.

Calderon, however, focuses our attention on how difficult it must have been to be Rabbi Akiva's son, growing up without a father at home. When you consider how the son presumably felt about a father and husband who abandoned his family in order to study Torah, then the son's unusual wedding night behaviour takes on a different meaning. From the very beginning he was making the point that in his marriage, Torah study would not involve separation from his wife.

The ending of the story describes the conversation between Rabbi Akiva and his son on the morning after the wedding. Rabbi Akiva asks his son whether he has found a good wife and his son answers that he has. Calderon suggests that this short conversation has a deeper significance. Rabbi Akiva presumably was delicately asking whether all had gone well on the wedding night. When his son said that he had found a good wife, though, he was telling his father (with dramatic irony, as we the readers know what he meant but his father doesn't) that he had established a better relationship with his wife than Rabbi Akiva's relationship with his.

In her first speech in the Knesset, Calderon argued passionately that the Torah and Talmud belong to all of the Jewish People, not just to Orthodox Jews. (The video of her dynamic speech, with English subtitles, can be found on YouTube.) Her book shows how different and worthwhile readings of our people's classics by knowledgeable Jewish readers from non-traditional backgrounds can be. ■

Ask Ella

Take back control

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

After my divorce, I met Julia. She helped me through my depression when I gained 30 pounds. Julia says I'll lose it when I'm ready, but since we've moved in together, she's done the shopping and cooking while I continue to gain weight. Julia has never had a weight problem and can eat whatever she likes. Everything she makes is laden with calories. I've been on enough diets to know that she's serving me poison. I don't want to hurt her feelings and have tried talking to her, but she says I'm being silly and look fine. I don't want to hurt her, but I'm growing on an hourly basis and feel very unhealthy.

Killing Me with Food

Dear Killing Me with Food

This is less about Julia and more about you. If you're overindulging in the wrong foods, it's because that's what you've chosen to do. Sparing Julia's feelings is an excuse to continue in this pattern.

It's easy to come home and have a delicious home-cooked comfort meal waiting for you after a stressful day. How many people could actually resist that? Enjoying it with someone you love is the icing on the cake (excuse the pun).

If you're really serious about regaining control over your body and mind, you need to take matters into your own hands and not sit back and enjoy being catered to. Enough time has passed since your divorce, and you're well into a new and loving relationship, but it's hard to say no, especially when it's so satisfying and enjoyable. You're not unusual. Who wouldn't like it? But letting it go on so long is where the danger comes in.

Take control. Insist on being part of weekly food planning. If you know your way around dieting, or "lifestyle change" as it's called today, you know how to put yourself on a healthier path with diet and exercise. There's no magic pill. Just do it.

Explain to Julia that you know she cares, but your excessive weight gain is making you unhappy, and enlist her help. Once she realizes she has been enabling your misery, she'll do what it takes to make you feel right again. Julia sounds like she really cares and wants what's best for you. Don't make this about her. It's all about you. Take your life back.

Dear Ella,

I was cleaning up after dinner when I heard a familiar sound coming from my son's pocket. He received a text message. Jeff was sitting on the couch in the family room with his sister and dad watching a movie. He typed something and no sooner did he put his phone down than two dings came from Jenna's phone. Jeff texted his sister who was sitting less than 15 feet away. When I confronted them, all I got was eye rolling and a dismissive tone. Can this actually be normal? Why can't we enjoy some family time together without everyone being so focused on their phones?

Texting Instead of Speaking

Dear Texting Instead of Speaking

Texting has become part of our lives. You will rarely take a walk, sit in a restaurant, doctor's office, theatre, bus or anywhere else without seeing someone texting. You can't change it, so get used to it. It's a normal way to communicate.

The question is why are your kids texting each other in the same room? Is it because they can't be bothered to speak? Were they discussing something they didn't want you to know? Or did they not want to disturb their dad's movie? Whatever the reason, it's your home, and if this really bothers you, take control.

Establish a rule that for a couple of hours during family time, smartphones must be switched off. You can be sure the backlash will be loud and fierce, but you're fighting against what has become a literal extension of our selves. Adults are just as guilty, so both you and your husband had better be prepared to adhere to this new rule of family communication.

If this is the worst problem you're having with your kids, you're doing very well. You may want to rethink why this is bothering you, considering that your family is home, together and sitting safely in front of you. This may not be as big a problem as you're making it out to be. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

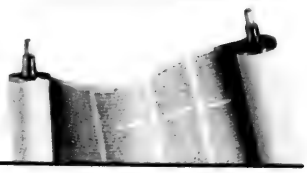
Korach | Numbers 16:1 - 18:32



Rabbi Ilan Acoca cautions that money spent unwisely will ultimately be hurtful to its possessor
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl wonders why some disagreements are permitted while others aren't Rabbi Catharine Clark examines the conveyance of meaning in the violent end of Korach's rebellion

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The Talmud explains that the opening phrase of this week's parshah, "Vayikach Korach" – "And Korach took" – teaches us that Korach made a bad purchase for himself. How are we to understand the Talmud? The Ben Ish Hai explains that ashir – Hebrew for wealthy person, which Korach was – is spelled ayin, shin, yud. If one donates his money to charity, it will assist him to get to the world to come, which is alluded to in the word yesh (spelled yud, shin). His money will not cause him harm because money can be harmful for a person if he wastes it on mundane matters. Therefore the word ashir, contains a first and last letter that spells the word ra, bad. The word yesh, or charity, breaks up the ra because the letters yud and shin comprise the middle letters of the word ashir.

When a person gives money to the necessities of yesh – that is, on matters that will bring him to the world to come – he will not be harmed when he spends his money on material possessions. If money is selfishly hoarded and not spent on worthwhile endeavours, it can become hurtful to its possessor, because the letters of yesh flee the ashir and what remains is ra.

Korach did not expend his money toward olam haba because he was a miser. He, therefore, only actualized into ra because he never developed and exerted effort to bring out the yesh in his character. Thus, our Sages said that he took a bad ra portion for himself. Mishlei 28:22 states that "a miserly man runs after wealth; he does not realize that wealth will overtake it." Since a miser does not give to charity, he winds up lacking. By withholding charity, the yesh is missing and the ashir is only left with ra. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

In Mishnah Avot, we're taught about the difference between the Korach gang's conflict with Moses and the disagreements of Hillel and Shammai. While the first didn't last, the latter persisted. What makes some disagreements permitted and others prohibited?

In 1656, the Portuguese Jewish community of Amsterdam declared that 23-year-old Baruch Espinoza "taught and practised... abominable heresies" and "monstrous deeds." Community members were prohibited from contact with him. Recently, a special committee advised the chief rabbi of Amsterdam that the cherem should remain for three reasons: Spinoza is dead, and he neither cared about the expulsion nor changed his views.

Should religious communities place boundaries on public discourse and private thought, or do restrictions interfere with a sincere quest for religious truth? According to Rabbi Ovadyah of Bartinura, when the Mishnah stated that "an argument for the sake of Heaven will endure," it meant that "the intent... is to reach the truth. This [truth] will endure, since 'From argument truth will emerge.'"

Despite the sometimes fierce fights between followers of Hillel and those of Shammai, the Talmud says they "did not abstain from marrying women from the families of [the other]." Whatever the dispute, they "displayed love and friendship," seeking ways to live with each other.

Recently, a rabbi made headlines for excoriating Reform, Conservative and open Orthodox expressions of Judaism, declaring that they are "steeped in apikursus [heresy, and their teaching] is a violation of the Maimonidean 13 Principles of Faith." However, research has shown that Maimonides' contemporaries and rabbis in later generations did not accept those principles as law and often differed about their details.

Spinoza's philosophy is still debated, but his extraordinary autonomy left him isolated from his community. It seems wiser to follow the words of Hillel: don't do onto others what you would not have done to yourself. Don't steal, cheat or lie. Help the poor, heal the sick and act with love and friendship. Make life better. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

The dramatic story of the rebellion of Korach and his followers reaches its climax in their violent deaths when they're consumed by fire, and by the earth that swallows them up. Unlike in Game of Thrones, there are no bodies to hang from the city walls as gruesome warnings to would-be rebels.

Instead, it appears the victors must resort to less obvious means of conveying the same dreadful message. At the Lord's command, Moses takes a staff from each chieftain and places them before the Pact in the Tent of Meeting, the inner chamber of the Tabernacle. Overnight, the staff of Levi, inscribed with Aaron's name, sprouts blossoms and almonds. The staffs are brought before the Israelites to demonstrate the miracle. Aaron's staff is returned to its place before the Pact as a sign for the rebels to cease their mutterings against God, lest they die.

As far as threats of a dreadful death go, the flowering staff isn't nearly as effective as a hanging body. It's symbolic of a horrible way to die, but the staff isn't on a city wall. Rather, it's in a part of the Tent of Meeting, where rebellious Israelites who long for priestly privileges will never see it.

Therefore, it must have a message more subtle than those sent by King Joffrey. (Plus, this is Torah, not Game of Thrones.) The true content of the message is to be found in who receives it. Only priests are permitted to approach the Pact, and only they will receive the message meant to warn potential rebels. Perhaps the message is that the priests must examine themselves for any behaviours of theirs that might lead others to rebel. Perhaps seeing Aaron's staff will be a check on boasting of their exclusive access to the holy or their importance to the community. You almost never see that kind of humility on Game of Thrones. ■

Drildzers mark 80 years in Toronto

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After five generations in Toronto, the Drildzer Congregation and Society celebrated its 80th anniversary at an event at Pride of Israel Synagogue.

The first group of Drildzer men began meeting informally in the early 1900s. Eight men formed the landsmanshaft in 1934. It became the Drildzer Young Men's Society and had an active sisterhood.

The congregation began on Huron Street, then moved twice more before settling into its current location on Wilson Avenue.

Ronnie Hoffer, president, is the daughter of the late Joe Rutman, one of the early members of the society. Her father served as president for many years. Hoffer followed her sister, the late Mae Waese, as president. Waese took the presidency when the society was close to expiring and revived it by including women and younger members on the board.

"She, together with a great team of like-minded members, breathed new life into the society," Hoffer told The CJN.

Rochelle Sufferin, the daughter of the late Jack Stopper, who was a founder of the organization and who became known as Mr. Drildz, chaired the multi-generational banquet, attended by about 75 people, out of about 100 member families.

At a candlelighting ceremony at the June 1 event, grandchildren of the founding members lit candles in memory of their ancestors.

Attendees watched an archival video of the history of the society, with the founding members telling how they came to Canada and started the society and why it became a significant part of their lives.

In her speech, Sufferin spoke of the activities of the society including regular meetings, summer picnics and banquets.

The society undertook the restoration of the cemetery established in 1837 in the small shtetl of Ilza, also known as Drildz. It was almost totally destroyed in World War II. A stone wall was constructed around the area with large iron gates at the entrance, and the society has arranged for ongoing upkeep. ■

Shmuley Boteach: Marriage needs lust

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, best-selling Kosher Sex author who is widely known as "America's Rabbi," will be one of about 50 speakers featured in the 15th annual Ideacity conference running from June 18 to 20 and streamed live from Toronto's Koerner Hall.

The webcast of the conference, starting 8 a.m. on June 18 at www.ideacityonline.com, will be hosted by the New AM 740 Zoomer Radio's Dale Goldhawk and Ramona Pringle.

Rabbi Boteach spoke to The CJN about his new book, Kosher Lust, which explores the idea that a successful marriage is built on lust, rather than love.

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach

Can you briefly describe what people can expect from your latest book?

The book maintains that lust is the most important ingredient in a marriage. The fact that we've gotten it wrong and made love so central is the principle reason we have an astronomical divorce rate. In other words, love is not a strong enough bond to keep a husband and wife together for the duration of their lives. Love is a warm, comforting emotion of partnership. Lust is a fiery, passionate emotion of erotic desire, and you're supposed to be in a marriage because you desire the person with an electrifying gravitation that we call lust. Lust has always been kosher. Judaism always promoted lust between a husband and wife. It was Christianity that targeted lust for condemnation, which is why we have a negative view of lust. But look at the 10th commandment, for example... thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, which means, you should be coveting your own wife.

Tell me about the three components of a lustful marriage: unavailability, mystery and sinfulness.

Steve Jobs became the most successful marketer in the world – he didn't want people to love his products, he wanted people to lust after his products. He wanted people to lust after an iPhone, the way Romeo lusted after Juliette, waiting outside her balcony. You're waiting in line for five hours to buy a phone. How did he do it? First and foremost, through unavailability. He made it impossible to buy the phone. Apple has a policy with its new products that they only put 300 in every store per day. They're sold out in an hour.

Can you tell me how people can inject mystery and sinfulness into a marriage?

Don't walk around the bedroom naked in front of each other. Don't over-expose yourself to one another... We tend to think that marriage involves no privacy and involves morphing into the personality of your spouse. I disagree with that completely. I think over-exposure of the body in marriage, for example, demagnetizes the body. We become bored of each other.

As far as sinfulness is concerned, we in the West live under the false assumption that men are much more sexual than women – that they have these elaborate sexual fantasies that women don't have, that they're much more interested in pornography. None of that is true. Women are much more sexual than men. They are multi-orgasmic, while men are uni-orgasmic. Many studies have shown that women have these very elaborate, very detailed sexual fantasizes about other men. They never tell their husbands, because they don't think that the brittle male ego can actually handle hearing about these fantasies.

Sometimes we have to, like, scrape away the outer layer and get to the core erotic nature of our wives, and I think many people in marriage sanitize women's sexuality. I even argue in the book that many husbands unwittingly extinguish their wives' libidos. They transform them from women to wives, from ladies into homemakers, from mistresses in mothers.

You don't believe that lust is a fleeting feeling or emotion that can't be maintained longer than the honeymoon stage of a relationship?

I don't believe that for a moment. The erotic mind can be easily influenced and manipulated through erotic principles. We simply have to understand it.

If it's true that it's chemical, how are the chemicals created? Why can't we manipulate the mind into seeing a relationship as novel and new? Studies show that the first reaction by a husband, upon discovering that his wife has been unfaithful interestingly enough, they want to have sex with their wives. They're angry, but they want to have sex with their wives. Why is that? Because the woman who you thought was incapable of that kind of unfaithfulness, or wasn't attracted to other men, or attractive to other men, she becomes something completely new right in front of his eyes. There is this sudden novelty. That's a destructive novelty to be sure – I'm only using it as an example, but it's a way of demonstrating that the erotic mind can be manipulated.

You say the question of "What do women want?" was one that even Sigmund Freud couldn't answer, but that based on your counselling experience, you've decided that women want to feel desired by their husbands.

The words that I use in the book is that what a woman most wants – and yes, Freud couldn't answer [French psychoanalyst] Marie Bonaparte's question in 1938 – what women most want is to be chosen. In other words, if a woman wants to be loved... why did she leave her parents' house? She's never going to be loved more than by her mother and father who will love her unconditionally and never divorce her... Her parents can give her everything in life except one thing, and it's the one thing she most wants. They can't choose her. To be chosen is to be distinguished. It's to be made to feel unique and special... But being loved in a marriage does not make you feel chosen. It makes you feel appreciated, it makes you feel protected, comforted, but it doesn't make you feel special. I know tons of wives who feel loved by their husbands, [but] who aren't happy. When someone desires you and pines for you, you feel incredibly special.

To paraphrase [Rabbi] Abraham Joshua Heschel, I always say that we want to be wanted, we need to be needed and we desire to be desired. ■

Abravanel and the 'biggest mistake' in Spanish history

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Don Isaac Abravanel, the renowned 15th-century Jewish scholar and financier, was a fatalist. In the aftermath of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, he searched for life's inner meaning, for its purpose and significance. He believed that God directed man's existence; that everything was pre-ordained, and that man was "a failure, dismal and hopeless, which can be rectified only by God."

If he were alive today, Abravanel would likely regard the Spanish government's decision to rectify "the biggest mistake" in its history, as Spain's justice minister, Alberto Ruiz-Gallardón called it, and welcome back Sephardi Jews 522 years later as far too long in coming, but still an act from the heavens.

When the legislation soon passes, Sephardi Jews around the world will be able to reclaim Spanish citizenship, which entitles them to a Spanish, as well as a European Union, passport. There is no requirement to relocate to Spain or give up another country's passport. All Sephardi applicants have to do is obtain proof of their family's heritage from a rabbi or local community organization.

Among those interested in Spain's offer will likely be some of the thousands of descendants of Don Isaac Abravanel and his extended family. Located across the globe, the Abravanel family, which dates back to 13th-century Spain, has over the centuries morphed into Abrabanel, Abarbanel, Barbanel and similar derivations.

According to Jonathan Abarbanel, a Chicago theatre critic, there are an estimated 250,000 people with some connection, albeit distant, to the revered Don Isaac. In 1992, on the 500th anniversary of the expulsion, the Abravanels held a family reunion in New York that attracted 130 members of the family, mainly from Europe and North America. Abarbanel finds the idea of obtaining a Spanish passport novel. "It would be a great treat to return once more as a citizen or at least as a not-so-humble tourist," he says.

One of those who attended the 1992 gathering was Howard Barbanel, a journalist from Long Island, N.Y., who now writes for the Huffington Post. He recalled in an interview with the New York Times that as a young boy more than one rabbi said to him: "Do you know who you are? Do you know where you come from?"

The Abravanels claimed descent from the house of King David. Such a distinction, whether true or not, conferred upon members like Don Isaac a distinguished and influential status.

Isaac Abravanel was born in 1437 in Portugal, where his family had relocated from Spain many years earlier. His grandfather and father had made much of their wealth as bankers and tax farmers (or collectors) for the royal court. Isaac followed his father, Don Judah, as an adviser to the king of Portugal.

In the early 1480s, Abravanel and his wife and children had to flee Portugal, after he was caught up in a palace intrigue. He found safety in neighbouring Spain, where the Catholic monarchs, Ferdinand and Isabella, were impressed by his integrity and his ability to manage finances. Still, in the spring of 1492, he could do nothing to quash the Edict of Expulsion, part of a grand plan following the conquest of the Moors (Muslims) to institute firm centralized Christian control.

Once Abravanel decided to leave Spain, he was given special permission to take 1,000 gold ducats out of the kingdom. This was the exception rather than the rule with Jewish wealth. The majority of the estimated 40,000 to 120,000 Jews who departed Spain were compelled to pay exorbitant royal exit taxes and sell their property for much less than it was worth.

Just as many Jews refused to give away their property and opted to convert to Christianity. They became conversos, new Christians, whose faith was suspect – and likely for good reason, since some continued to secretly practice Judaism.

Abravanel and his family found refuge in Naples and later in Venice. Many more members of his family, like other Sephardim, established new lives in the Ottoman Empire, where the sultans welcomed their expertise as merchants and artisans. Many settled in Salonika (now Thessaloniki, Greece), which by the middle of the 16th century had a Jewish population of 20,000. From there, the Abravanels eventually moved to every corner of the Diaspora. ■

Israeli artists part of Tel Aviv square's makeover

JEFFREY F. BARKEN
JNS.org

The Norman Tel Aviv, a luxurious boutique establishment, has restored two buildings on Nachmani Street, at the heart of the Tel Aviv UNESCO heritage site for historic Bauhaus architecture. The newly renovated hotel's management is also a dedicated patron of the arts, seeking to support contemporary artistic expression in Israel. When complete, the complex will be a travel destination that houses and showcases many avant-garde cultural treasures.

"Tremendous care has been taken to restore these buildings to their original grandeur, preserving the eclectic style, Renaissance and oriental influences that characterize the edifice at 23 Nachmani, as well as the striking modernist architecture of the adjacent building at 25 Nachmani," says Olivier Heuchenne, managing director of The Norman.

The hotel – whose grand opening is planned for this summer – will sport an interior design echoing the luxury and style of the grand hotels of the early 20th century, featuring top restaurants, an extraordinary collection of Israeli artwork, an elegant library bar, and The Norman's signature world-class amenities.

Outside The Norman Tel Aviv hotel COURTESY OF THE NORMAN TEL AVIV

The art collection of more than 100 works stands at the centre of this accomplishment, uniting design themes and creating an interactive experience for guests. Featured are works by Ilit Azoulay, Sigalit Landau, Klone, Dana Levy, Assaf Shaham, and Tsibi Geva, among others, celebrating a class of leading contemporary Israeli artists whose work already is exhibited worldwide.

For Tamar Dresdner, the in-house art curator and consultant who selects works for display, the opportunity to participate in the restoration was a dream come true.

> Participating in restoration was a dream come true

"I've been living in Tel Aviv for years," Dresdner says.

"I remember walking past these buildings when they were residential properties and then entering them when they housed offices for businesses and lawyers. I always fantasized about what could be done with the space."

Mindful of the layered history that defines the new hotel's premises, Dresdner sought works she felt were in dialogue with the buildings. "Since we have an eclectic style building, I wanted eclectic art," she explains. This meant acquiring works of assorted media, including video, sculpture, photography, and paintings.

Four innovative charities in Israel

DANIELA BERKOWITZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Israel, known for its startups, also has produced some forward-thinking and unique charities that service various populations in Israel. Below are four innovative charities that showcase Israel's creativity and compassion.

Efrat: A Charity Warehouse

Always fully stocked, this central Jerusalem warehouse could be confused with a nursery because there are hundreds of brand-new strollers, cribs and baby bathtubs. There's a whole wall of baby clothing and many boxes of food. Volunteers are packing boxes with diapers, wipes, food and clothing.

This warehouse belongs to the organization, Efrat, started in 1977 by the vision of a Holocaust survivor named Herschel Feigenbaum, whose principal goal was to increase the Jewish birthrate.

Founder Dr. Eli Schussheim and his team of social workers and volunteers have helped some 4,000 women from every corner of Israel, who receive free boxes each month. This support lasts up to two years.

A group of boys at an Ohel Sarah school program participate in a baking competition.

"We are the only organization in the world that is successfully removing the financial pressures for women, and giving them a fair choice," said Schussheim.

"We show [a woman] the joy that comes from raising a child. We help her financially, and she feels empowered."

Non-political, Dr. Schussheim and his volunteers offer aid to support women through community. "Our volunteers, mostly women who have previously received support from Efrat, befriend other women in need and guide them, instilling new mothers with hope. The physical support eases so many of their burdens."

One woman attributes Efrat for helping her "live life a little easier." She recalled, "the packages saved me so much stress, it's indescribable. The assistance and guidance from the volunteers was tremendous. I am so grateful that they helped me raise my beautiful son."

Meir Panim: Easing the Burden for Israel's Neediest

More than 1.7 million Israelis – about 22 per cent of Israel's population – are living below the poverty line, according to the 2013 National Insurance Institute's annual report. This data shows that one out of three children and more than 180,000 elderly live in poverty. Since 2000, Meir Panim has been responding to this crisis in a variety of ways. Meir Panim – which literally means "lighting up faces" – serves all Israelis, regardless of ethnicity or religious background through food and social service programs that give dignity, respect and relief to many of the country's neediest residents.

Annually, the organization serves at least 300,000 free meals out of restaurant-style soup kitchens, which also prepare meals for delivery to the elderly and homebound. In addition, Meir Panim targets children in impoverished areas, offering hot lunches, after-school clubs and summer day camps.

Ruth is 85 years old and a regular at Meir Panim's free restaurant in Jerusalem. Widowed, Ruth fell into a serious depression after her husband passed away five years ago. Today, Meir Panim helps her stay socially active, well fed and happy. "They take care of us and are kind," she said. "Whoever thought of and built this institution is doing a huge mitzvah taking care of us – the people of Israel who have no family or work to sustain us."

Ohel Sarah: A Home for Life

For families raising a child with disabilities, the challenges are endless. Miriam, a mother of five, remembers how "normal" her life was until Sammy, her youngest son, was diagnosed with autism at age two. To care for Sammy, she needed to drive him to therapies and appointments nearly every day, taking a toll on her ability to work, and care for herself and for Sammy's siblings. Depleted, Miriam saw that her son needed attention and care she just could not give. With a partner like Ohel Sarah, both the child and their families win.

The organization services people with special needs starting at age six and through their entire lives. Programs range from educational centres, group homes, and even employment opportunities for adults, empowering people with special needs to blossom in the right environment. "At Ohel Sarah, we give parents peace of mind knowing that there is someone to take care of their child and that someone is going to be there when they cannot," said Naomi Kovitz, director of development at Ohel Sarah.

Under the guidance of Ohel Sarah's staff and programs, both children and adults can develop and be supported with friendships, compassion and care. Over 400 people across Israel benefit from similar programs and the expert guidance of trained therapists, teachers and counsellors.

United Hatzalah: Rescue in Minutes

Combining technology, skill and volunteers has made United Hatzalah Israel's fastest emergency responders. In 2013, the organization's network of 2,300 volunteer emergency medical technicians (EMTs) treated 211,000 people across Israel for free. One-quarter of these people were found in life-threatening condition, yet all were treated within minutes by United Hatzalah volunteers.

United Hatzalah volunteers quickly treat an injured man following an accident.

"In order to save lives, we want to arrive at the scene of an emergency as soon as it happens," said Eli Beer, president and founder of United Hatzalah. "To do that, we use the best technology, and have volunteers located on every block across the country who are dedicated, able and ready to leave everything and respond without thinking twice."

In order to get there quickly, each volunteer uses a specially designed GPS app to alert volunteers in close proximity to an accident or injury. It guides volunteers on the shortest route, decreasing the average response time to under three minutes. Equipped with medical supplies, a volunteer stabilizes the victim until an ambulance arrives. In addition, United Hatzalah's fleet of 320 "ambu-cycles" can navigate through traffic and treat people at the scene of an emergency.

All names have been changed to preserve anonymity. ■

A guitar and a contrabass are the first things you see when you walk into the Jerusalem home of Debby and Zohar Elnatan. You also notice the adaptive equipment for 19-year-old Rotem, who has cerebral palsy.

Those two elements – music and a child with special needs – are dominant threads in the tapestry of the five Elnatans' lives.

Debby Elnatan was recently the centre of global media attention following the April 7 launch of the Firefly Upsee, a novel co-walking harness based on a contraption she invented when Rotem was two years old.

"So many orders – thousands – came in over the first few days, that the website crashed," she says. "Parents all over the world are putting up videos on Facebook showing them walking or dancing with their kids for the first time. Some show siblings hugging for the first time. Parents write to me about their Upsee before they even take the price tag off. It's just incredible how virally this spread. Within one week it was in China, Bosnia, Iran, South America, Japan – the four corners of the earth."

CNN Turkey and a Brazilian television crew interviewed her, as well as an Italian radio station after a piece they did on the Upsee got 4.5 million hits.

Elnatan, 56, was born in Syracuse, N.Y., and moved to Israel in 1983. She's a lifelong music lover. "I'm a fiddler, and I have a country band called Habandanot [The Bandanas]. We do Wild West events all over Israel."

Her father taught her to work with tools, a skill that came in handy when she became the parent of a child with CP.

"If I saw something Rotem needed, I would build a prototype," she says.

"Since he was one year old I've designed crawling, seating, standing and walking equipment refined through trial and error. I have one patent and another patent application pending, and a lot of products to get into the market. I hope all my inventions will be commercialized, because I have a lot to offer and I want to give other families the advantages I had."

She is adamant that her inventions be sold online to remain affordable. The Irish company Leckey created a retail website for the Firefly Upsee and another product, after refining its design and testing it extensively throughout the United Kingdom.

Each of Elnatan's items is designed to leave the parent's hands free and give therapeutic benefits while allowing the child to participate in family activities.

Preserving the memories of Israel's creation

JUDY LASH BALINT
JNS.org

Elad Peled, 87, has told the story of how he was injured during the battle for Safed in Israel's War of Independence many times. Now, for the first time, the retired Israel Defence Forces major general's account of his days as Palmach commander will be readily accessible through a joint project of Toldot Yisrael (Chronicles of Israel) and Israel's National Library.

For Peled and hundreds of others who played a pivotal role in the creation of the state of Israel, the Toldot Yisrael initiative provides peace of mind that their stories will not be forgotten.

Conceived seven years ago by Eric Halivni, an American immigrant to Israel with a background in Jewish education and non-profit management, Toldot Yisrael has been quietly working to do for Israel what Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History project has done for Holocaust memory.

Dr. Zimra Peled (left) and Israel Defence Forces Maj. Gen. (retired) Elad Peled, Palmach veterans.

Halivni says he was astonished to learn after he made aliyah that there was no comprehensive archive to document the founding of the state. "There are some oral and written histories in places like the Palmach Museum, the Rabin Center, and Kibbutz Kfar Etzion," he notes, "but no comprehensive project that makes all this incredible material easily accessible in one archive."

> Toldot Yisrael has completed 1,000 interviews resulting in 3,000 hours of raw footage

To date, with funding from several prominent U.S foundations and private individuals, Toldot Yisrael has completed 1,000 interviews resulting in 3,000 hours of raw footage. "It's not only about the War of Independence," Halivni emphasizes. "We're documenting people who were witnesses to history."

One of Toldot Yisrael's first interviews was with Zionist leader Arieh Handler. Until his death at age 95 in 2011, Handler was the last living witness to the Israeli Declaration of Independence on May 14, 1948. During his interview for the Toldot archives, Handler produced a hand-addressed invitation to the event in Tel Aviv.

Danny Streifler, director of digital photo archive and interactive services at the National Library of Israel, is excited at the prospect of bringing such gems to light. "The National Library was always very good at preserving material in the basement. Now we want to provide the widest access, and the Toldot Yisrael collaboration is the perfect merge," he says.

While many interviews are available on YouTube, what the National Library hopes to offer is the added value of links to existing archival material on events recounted by the participants.

Plans call for the Toldot Yisrael interviews and documentation to be used by scores of Israeli teachers who attend summer programs at the National Library to develop curriculum related to Israel's history.

So far, material from Toldot Yisrael interviews has been used in the Eyewitness 1948 series of documentary films that have aired on Israel's History Channel and been viewed online more than 500,000 times, as well as in a series of two-minute films entitled The Founders: The Story of the 1948 Generation, which features kibbutzniks, new immigrants of the time, and members of the Lehi and Haganah who bring their different perspectives to that turbulent era.

For Peled, the former Palmach commander, that's one of the reasons for his enthusiasm for the Toldot Yisrael-National Library collaboration. "The same event can be viewed so many ways by different people," he says. In order for history to be understood, various perspectives need to be taken into account, and that's the strength of the huge number of interviews that will now be archived and available.

"I didn't dance in the street after the Nov. 29, 1947 UN vote. I was on guard at Kibbutz Ramot Naftali near the Lebanese border. I was 20 years old and wrote a letter to my mother, that I had a very heavy feeling. I knew we were entering war," he recalls.

Peled, a former director general of Israel's Ministry of Education, and his wife Zimra, who holds a PhD from Columbia University, have been married for 66 years. Zimra was also a member of the Palmach unit that escorted convoys between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem during the siege of Jerusalem. The Peleds are acutely aware of the need to intensify efforts to digitally record the testimonies of the shrinking ranks of eyewitnesses to Israel's founding and surviving military veterans of the 1948 War.

"This afternoon we're going to another funeral of one of our Palmach chevra (group of friends)," Peled tells reporters. "We are disappearing every week." ■

Program restores balance

"Having a child with special needs can bring great stress to a family and all the relationships in it," Elnatan says. "There is a danger of investing too many resources in the child with special needs at the expense of the health of the family."

Rotem's older brother, Shachar, is a professional jazz guitarist, while 12-year-old Inbar is the one who plays the guitar and contrabass. Zohar is a guitarist and music teacher. Rotem, an aspiring DJ, entertained at a Passover party at Ilanot, his special school in Jerusalem. His mom lent some help. "We do what he can't and he does the rest, and feels great about it," she says.

Before Rotem was born, Debby and Zohar started an evening music group through the Shekel Association, which provides community services for people with special needs with the support of JDC Israel, the Ministry of Social Affairs, the Jerusalem municipality and other agencies. This remains a weekly commitment.

"We perform with our drumming group around the country at regular schools as a way of introducing people who have special needs in a fun environment," she explains. "The group includes young adults with a variety of special needs, who all like music and have good rhythm."

About 12 years ago, Elnatan conceived of a program with Miri Weiss, another mother of a special-needs child, to counter what they term "the broken child syndrome."

"If you break an arm it does heal, but children with a chronic disease or impairments may never become like a typical child," she explains. "If you always see your child as broken and needing to be fixed, it will cause an imbalance in your family."

After 11 years of seeking a sponsor and sitting in board meetings, the Shemesh (Full Family Rehabilitation) pilot program was born to help restore family balance through play and leisure, family participation, sibling togetherness, parenting, and learning how to ask for help. Parents of older children with special needs are trained to accompany families with younger children with special needs.

> Family is the main influence behind the quality of life of a child

JDC Israel developed the program and sought governmental funding partners. A three-year pilot of Shemesh is now wrapping up in communities including Ashkelon, Rosh Ha'ayin, Baqa al-Gharbiyye and Rehovot.

"We had to get the government to understand that family is the main influence and mover behind the quality of life of the child, and they need to help the entire family," says Elnatan.

Play builds special-needs children's confidence and personality, she says. "The best advice I got was from [Israeli clinical psychologist] Aliza Vig, who recommends parents find what brings a spark to their child's eye and follow that lead." She was also advised to favour activities that the parent enjoys as much as the child.

The same goes for siblings. Inbar says that he and Rotem play Wii and card games, bake cookies and prepare salads together. "Maybe it's because he was in the Upsee [when he was younger] and could stand and do things with his hands," the preteen says. ■

Art offers glimpse into communities

In contrast to other hotels, which typically hang commercially reproduced prints and stock décor, Dresdner has taken significant risks in her selection, making the collection reflective of Israel's fractious social dialogue, as well as an open-ended commentary on the country's economic and political situation. "A work, even in a hotel, should challenge the viewer," Dresdner says. "[In Israel], we are sitting on a powder keg. Art should ask questions, not offer answers, directing the viewer to places that are not clear, that are edgy and explosive."

A small sampling of the collection reveals a wide breadth of styles and themes. Paintings by Tsibi Geva offer penetrating glimpses into Israel's communities. "Tsibi is very influenced by American abstract paintings, but he is also very local. His work addresses political issues and is very rooted in this place," says Dresdner.

Sigalit Landau's salt crystal sculptures and videos draw from the Dead Sea landscape and mythology. Works by the graffiti artist Klone, meanwhile, provide a fresh perspective of Israel's melting pot immigrant heritage and the collision of disparate cultural populations in Israel's cities.

"An immigrant himself, Klone's works mirror the alienation of urban life and explore the difficulty of assimilation," Dresdner says.

Ilit Azoulay's photography in the collection captures a particular sensitivity for the artifacts of urban decay. "The artist goes into dilapidated buildings, discovers objects, and then by shooting each one separately and digitally re-assembling them, creates a new reality from the city's demolished environments," Dresdner explains.

To mimic the series of modernist windows on the larger building at 25, Dresdner was attracted to sequential compositions that extend the prevailing colour scheme composed of pleasant blues, browns, cream, and pinks. Likewise, renowned British designer David d'Almada of Sagrada was conscious of the patterns found in the salvaged and refurbished antique tile floors. He cleverly designed curtains and bedspreads that duplicate geometric shapes and colours, blending textured elements in harmony with the elegant and conceptual artwork.

The Norman's management made a point of supporting Israeli artists through the collection. In a move that is rare in the art world, 95 per cent of the collection has been purchased directly from the artists. "When you ask an artist to loan their work, you are manipulating them," Dresdner says, noting the opportunity cost lost by artists when their work lingers on someone's walls without promise of remuneration. "We made a point of buying from artists," she adds.

The collection will have a permanent and prominent presence in the city, attracting collectors, critics, and art enthusiasts. By request, Dresdner will provide tailored art tours based on each guest's specific interests, and the artists whose work is displayed will be invited to participate in sponsored events.

To establish a tradition in Israel that supports and appreciates the arts has proven challenging. External pressures and internal discord relentlessly strain the country's resources and people, undermining their enthusiasm for artistic and visionary talent. But The Norman Tel Aviv is hoping to create a mechanism for promoting emerging artists, and through the art to stimulate discussion of themes relating to Israel's existential issues. Notably, the hotel's financial investment in artists will continue past this summer's grand opening, according to Heuchenne, who notes The Norman plans to offer an annual prize to "celebrate an artist's success and promote their continued development." ■

New tool is on the way in the fight against leukemia

KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL 21C

Dr. Shai Yarkoni

A new Israeli company is using the natural process of cell death to help people undergoing transplants of all kinds live longer. This counterintuitive approach is the vision of Cellect – and could radically change the way people with leukemia manage their disease.

Stem cells hold the promise to eradicate cancer and other devastating diseases. But one of the biggest bottlenecks for clinicians and researchers is getting enough stem cells in a blood sample to use in transplantation.

If too many of the donor's regular body cells are left in the sample, a patient undergoing a bone-marrow transplant will probably suffer an immune reaction, which can be deadly. In fact, about half of all bone-marrow transplants lead to graft vs. host disease, requiring a lifetime of immunosuppressant drugs.

A new approach to harvesting stem cells is required, says Dr. Shai Yarkoni, a medical doctor, biomed expert and co-founder and CEO of Cellect.

"Stem cells are defined not by how they look but what they can do. So my partner, Dr. Nadir Askenasy – also a physician, a chemist and a genius – came up with an intuitive approach for how we should select them from a sample for transplantation," says Yarkoni.

Several companies, such as Miltenyi Biotec in Germany, make tools to cull stem cells from donor blood. But the process is expensive, about $50,000 per transplant, and requires three days of work by skilled personnel. Worse, the current technology still leaves a significant amount of body cells behind – or alternatively, too few stem cells.

"Thousands of companies and millions of researchers know what they can do with stem cells, but the raw material is the critical issue," Yarkoni says. "How do you get enough stem cells to start the treatment?"

Cellect's stem-cell selection kit, a unique medical device originally conceived by Askenasy about a decade ago, could accomplish the task more effectively, and for a fraction of the cost.

The only tool that's needed is a biological hood, and these can be found even in developing countries. The process takes less than 10 hours and it's simple to do, based on the natural process of cell death (apoptosis).

All cells in our body are programmed to die and turn into "compost" at certain points in their life cycle, says Yarkoni. And stem cells migrate to areas with extensive apoptosis because their job is to rebuild tissue.

Significantly, the stem cells withstand the biological process that would trigger the death of other cells lingering in the area.

By simulating apoptosis in a tube lined with a cell death-causing protein, the Cellect kit effectively kills the immune response-inducing cells while leaving the very desirable stem cells intact for the transplant. They call this process "aposorting."

The company has published about 15 scientific reports on its findings involving animal studies, says Yarkoni.

About 80 per cent of the control group in his lab experiments developed graft vs. host disease. Using stem cells collected with Cellect technology, the numbers went down to about zero. Similar results were seen in vitro on human cells.

Cellect will be recruiting patients for Phase I clinical trials in about one year, pending approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

Yarkoni expects to have Cellect's first product on the market within four years.

He predicts that within the next decade, Cellect's kit will make a bone-marrow transplant about as risky as getting your appendix removed. This is major news for anyone with immune-related diseases and disorders from lupus to Crohn's, leukemia and diabetes.

"We [reduce] the risk, and so we believe that bone-marrow transplantation can be a huge solution for all autoimmune diseases." For now, the company is focusing on leukemia.

Cellect was founded in 2011 and is based in Kfar Saba, Israel, where it employs a team of six people. The founder physicians have been best friends since childhood.

The company has just raised $5 million and was previously funded with a $1 million seed fund contributed by the founders. Strategic partners are currently sought to bring the technology forward. ■

Hebrew U professor moves printing into the future

ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
ISRAEL 21C

Ever notice how a spilled drop of coffee spreads into a ring stain on your shirt? The particle-filled liquid flows outward from the drop, leaving the particles on the rim of the ring as the liquid evaporates.

This phenomenon posed big problems for printers. How do you keep drops of ink in place? Then Hebrew University Prof. Shlomo Magdassi realized it could actually provide a way to move the industry toward a fantastic future in functional printing.

"Instead of solving the coffee-ring problem, I thought I could use it," he says.

On the university's Givat Ram campus in Jerusalem, a company called ClearJet uses Magdassi's patented technique to make transparent conductors by digitally printing clusters of narrow silver nanoparticles, forming "coffee rings" on plastic or glass. This is what makes the touchscreen on your smartphone possible.

"When I started to be involved in the world of digital printing, there was very little public information on how to make the inks, so I had to learn from scratch," says Magdassi in his office at the university's Casali Institute of Applied Chemistry.

Since 1995, he has formulated revolutionary micro-nanoparticle solutions to deliver active ingredients, whether in cosmetics, pharmaceuticals or inks.

In California's Mojave Desert, the Israeli-US company BrightSource Energy built the world's largest solar electricity generation installation using coatings containing nanoparticles that Magdassi and a colleague, Prof. Daniel Mandler, developed. The field's mammoth towers are each surrounded by about 10,000 mirrors throwing sunlight at them.

The mural-like glass walls made by the Israeli company Dip-Tech, adorning buildings across the world, are based on Magdassi's patented GlassJet, a heat-resistant digital inkjet ink made of nanoparticles of glass and inorganic pigments.

"What I do is related to basic science, but I also like to see something real coming out of it – a product on the shelf – and I was lucky to have several products go on the market based on my inventions," says Magdassi, a pioneer in silver nano-inks for printing conductors directly on plastic or solar cells.

"It's all about controlling the behaviour of the particles, which is based on basic colloid science," he says.

Yissum, the university's research and development company, licensed Magdassi's process to XJet Solar, an Israeli firm that makes nano-ink and inkjet printers for solar cells.

Magdassi is now working with Yissum to find a commercial partner to develop his new oxidation-resistant copper nano-inks for inexpensive printing of conductive patterns on heat sensitive plastic substrates.

Chemistry a lifelong dream

Shlomo Magdassi in his lab

Remarkably, the 60-year-old scientist's life trajectory has taken him from ma'abara (transit camp) to ma'abada (laboratory).

His parents emigrated from Iraq in 1951, married and settled into one of the hard-scrabble transit camps set up for new immigrants in Ramle, not far from today's Ben-Gurion International Airport.

Though his home lacked material comforts, his education propelled him to become the first of his family to earn a doctorate. "I knew when I was in fifth grade I was going to be a chemist, while conducting experiments at home," Magdassi says.

After serving in the army, Magdassi went to the Hebrew University and never left, aside from an 18-month postdoctoral fellowship in Ohio and a sabbatical in Los Angeles, Calif., during which he developed nanoparticle drugs.

His wife, Tsila, is deputy director of school psychological services for Jerusalem. Their son, 27, is studying industrial design at the renowned Bezalel Academy of Art and Design in Jerusalem. Their 23-year-old daughter, recently back in Israel after a post-army trip around the world and volunteering in Uganda, will study law and social work at the Hebrew University next fall.

Magdassi's students readied a few dazzling demos for the fourth International Nanotechnology Conference and Exhibition (NanoIsrael) conference in the spring in Tel Aviv.

Among the printed electronics they fashioned are electro-luminescent devices imprinted with transparent conductors – in other words, a lamp illuminated by nanoparticles.

"Using our inks, you could have signage without light bulbs, and sensors of all kinds," says Magdassi as his master's student Alon Shimoni plugs in a glass panel on which the word "Yissum" lights up.

"You can print contactless credit cards, solar cells and RFID [radiofrequency identification] tags, which are a type of antenna.

"It's all related to how we make a small particle and put it on a substrate exactly where we need it. Then we use its specific property to get something out of it."

Silver has long been known as an excellent and stable conductor, but at $700 to $1,000 per kilogram, it's not practical for mass ink manufacturing. Copper, less than $7 per kilo, has similar conductivity but not stability, as it oxidizes quickly on contact with air.

Magdassi hit on the unique idea of using copper precursors of the metal, because they do not oxidize.

"Once we put it on a substrate and heat it to a certain temperature, it decomposes and makes a self-reduction, meaning it converts into copper and it becomes conductive," says Magdassi. "The copper nanoparticles are formed from the precursor and therefore it's stable."

Yissum CEO Yaacov Michlin noted that the total market for printed, organic and flexible electronics is projected to grow from approximately $16 billion in 2013 to $76.8 billion in the next 10 years.

"The copper-based nano-ink invented by Prof. Magdassi solves some of the major limitations that are preventing widespread use of conductive inks, and we are certain that this novel ink will become an important aspect of the growing industry of printed electronics," Michlin said. ■

Hologram-guided surgery a heatbeat away

ISRAEL21C

It sounds like something out of a sci-fi thriller, but an Israeli holographic imaging system for the operating room is poised to revolutionize surgery in the near future.

Though only in the clinical beta prototype stage, the world's first 3D holographic display and interaction system for medical applications was already featured on the TV show Grey's Anatomy and has been tested successfully by surgeons at Israel's Schneider Children's Medical Center in Petah Tikva.

This proprietary digital technology from RealView Imaging in Yokneam projects hyper-realistic, dynamic 3D holographic images of body structures "floating in the air" without the need for special glasses or a conventional screen.

The physician can literally touch and interact precisely with the projected three-dimensional volumes, providing an unprecedented tool for planning, performing and evaluating minimally invasive surgical procedures.

Co-founder Shaul Gelman explains that the breakthrough technology can be summarized as very rapid printing of light in free space. The system is fed with data from standard medical imaging sources, such as ultrasound.

The doctor sees a hovering dynamic image such as a pumping heart or a fetus moving in utero – and can manipulate that image to guide an actual surgical procedure.

In RealView's pilot study, clinicians manipulated the projected 3D heart structures by touching the holograms.

Eventually, RealView Imaging's technology could enhance capabilities in anything from virtual gaming to architectural design. For now, the focus is on medical applications.

"Our system is built from two subsystems," Gelman says.

"The first system can take any 3D data – from ultrasound, CT, MRI or even from your computer. Instead of printing this data, we create a hologram out of it with our unique hardware and software, and then it goes to an electro-optical system that reconstructs this data in three dimensions in free space."

A hologram is formed by the interference of light beams from a laser or other light source. This invention won Dennis Gabor a Nobel Prize in physics in 1971. Since then, it was the holy grail of display technologies to create the sort of live, high-quality, full-colour usable holograms now demonstrated by RealView Imaging.

For the Schneider trial concluded in October, RealView Imaging used real-time data from 3D cardiac ultrasound and 3D interventional X-ray systems made by the Dutch-based Philips Healthcare. The trial successfully proved the real-time feasibility of using holographic visualization and interaction technology during minimally invasive structural heart disease procedures.

"The holographic projections enabled me to intuitively understand and interrogate the 3D spatial anatomy of the patient's heart, as well as to navigate and appreciate the device-tissue interaction during the procedure," said Dr. Einat Birk, pediatric cardiologist and director of the Institute of Pediatric Cardiology at Schneider Children's Medical Center.

"We are continuing clinical evaluations and working on our first commercial system, which will take into account all the input that we received in clinical trials and technical analysis and testing," says Gelman, who also is vice-president for research and development due to his expertise in electro-optical and display technologies.

The company aims to have this system ready for sale next year. Talks are currently underway with potential partners.

"We are very passionate about realistic visualization and intuitive interaction with 3D images, specifically for medical imaging," Gelman says.

"Minimally invasive procedures are becoming more common, so it is more of a necessity to understand 3D data. There is no better way to do that than with a hologram, and interacting with it is only possible with a 3D hologram. We are happy to collaborate with any company that shares this passion."

RealView Imaging – not to be confused with two other Israeli companies, RealView Medical and Real Imaging – was founded in 2008 by Gelman along with entrepreneur Aviad Kaufman and Prof Carmel Rotschild, who heads optical engineering studies at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology. The company's medical director is Dr. Elchanan Bruckheimer, director of the cardiac catheterization laboratories at Schneider Children's Medical Center.

Financed by the founders in its first years, RealView Imaging raised additional private funding led by its chair, serial medical device entrepreneur Dr. Shimon Eckhouse. He is currently chair of Syneron Medical.

In addition to cardiac applications, RealView Imaging medical holography could also be used in obstetrics, orthopedics and neurosurgery – "anyplace that 3D data gives added value to the physician, procedure or patient," says Gelman.

Negev tourism is now an easy train ride from the rest of Israel's treasures

JEFFREY F. BARKEN
JNS.ORG

Past the Gaza Strip, toward the rocket-battered city of Sderot, a new train now connects isolated Negev communities to the larger Israeli population centres. Not surprisingly, the Sderot line also opens the gates to increased tourism in that region.

For many people in Sderot, the new rocket-proof train station, which opened in December 2013, was a landmark event symbolic of the noble national effort that Israel's first president, David Ben-Gurion, outlined in his 1963 speech, "The Renewed State of Israel."

"The Negev is a great Zionist asset, with no substitute anywhere in the country," Ben-Gurion said. "It is a desolate area which... has the potential to be densely populated, even amounting to millions."

This is an exciting process of infrastructure development, expansion, and national renewal. The train ride through the desert territory to the south offers travellers a unique glimpse into the social-economic and national security realities faced by the modern state of Israel.

It is also a starkly beautiful, scenic, and rugged trail of adventure. Indeed, the view from a southbound train is a spectacular realization of Ben-Gurion's vision for the Negev. Tall cranes dot the horizon of Israel's rising cities south of Tel Aviv. Among the white sands, shrub studded hills, and sprouting wheat fields, high-rise apartments are under construction everywhere.

New developments gradually are easing Israel's shortage of affordable housing, and cities like Ashkelon and Sderot are booming despite the ever-present threat of terror from hostile neighbour Hamas.

"Sderot was dying until we went into Gaza with operation Pillar of Defence," Marianne Navon, a resident of Kibbutz Dorot, situated five miles east of Sderot, says.

"Now the city is safe. [Israel's] Iron Dome [missile defence system] is effective, and every single apartment in Sderot has had a shelter built. It's no longer fun for Hamas to aim rockets here," she says.

According to Yankele Grosfeld, who manages the small guesthouse at Kibbutz Dorot, Israel's south is a practical destination for tourists seeking to make the "star trip of Israel." "We are only one hour from every major site – Jerusalem, the Dead Sea, and Tel Aviv – and it is much cheaper to stay here," Grosfeld says.

Couples can enjoy a cozy room at Kibbutz Dorot for as little as 400 shekels (about $115) per night. Their accommodation includes an Israeli breakfast, and on Friday evenings they can join kibbutz members at the communal dining hall for a traditional Shabbat dinner experience.

The kibbutz itself is a beautifully landscaped oasis, including a lap pool, and there are scenic trails to be taken through the surrounding garlic and carrot fields, citrus orchards, and olive groves.

"Tourists love the cows," says the secretary of Kibbutz Dorot's guesthouse, Orian Orbach. "Foreigners come to enjoy the quiet country, biking and hiking trails, commute to the other major sites, and then return for a pleasant weekend."

Nearby, at Kibbutz Ruhama, early risers can catch a brilliant sunrise over the badlands. The rolling grassy landscape marked with scattered Roman ruins offers the ideal picnic spot. For 100 shekels (about $29), tourists can also experience the best view of the Negev and Gaza by chartering a hot air balloon tour of the countryside.

Further south, the hot springs and Turkish baths at Kibbutz Zeelim are also a popular destination. Be sure to arrange your visit in advance, as space is limited.

History buffs seeking a perspective on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict should visit "Black Arrow" park, where they can glimpse a panorama of the no man's land between Israel and Gaza, and read the memorial plaques illustrating the military campaigns fought to defend this territory.

A little secret: There is also a small museum behind the police station in Sderot, where visitors can view some of the mangled Qassam rockets fired from Gaza. The sporadic rocket assaults that have stymied Sderot's growth in the past are an unfortunate reality, one of which visitors and residents are all too painfully aware. "Normally we are not really having that experience," Orbach says.

But while area residents "hear the booms [of Gaza rockets] and it is vivid, the threat is small," according to Orbach.

"During the attacks, we had a few guests with families that were frightened. We showed them we have shelters, and they relaxed. If they wanted to leave, of course, we were pleasant with them. Afterwards, they came back," Orbach says. Sderot has proven resilient in the face of aggression.

Researchers focuses on how to ditch reading glasses

ISRAEL21C

Visual crowding is a condition that prevents some people from seeing beyond the clutter – or recognizing people's faces, objects or single letters inside big words. It's a common problem among people with lazy eye, traumatic brain injuries, and those of us who need reading glasses.

Until now, it was believed that visual crowding was caused by a problem in the peripheral vision.

But in a new study published in Nature's Scientific Reports, Prof. Uri Polat, Maria Lev and Dr. Oren Yehezkel of Tel Aviv University's Goldschleger Eye Research Institute have found that visual crowding can be traced to a different area in the eye – the fovea, the sharp vision centre in the retina. The way it is linked to the brain's processor appears to have a strong influence on visual crowding.

"Current theories strongly stress that visual crowding does not exist in the fovea, that it's a phenomenon that exists only in peripheral visual fields," said Polat. "But our study points to another part of the eye altogether – the fovea – and contributes to a unified model for how the brain integrates visual information."

The Tel Aviv University researchers showed that visual crowding can be linked from the retina to the brain's processing speed. This makes them suspect that using novel training methods focused on the fovea could help people overcome their limitations and let them ditch the reading glasses altogether.

Polat says that vision is dynamic and it has the ability to adapt quickly to new things, yet it still takes a certain amount of time for the brain to process what it is seeing – whether news headlines on the television screen, or an abundance of traffic signs along a highway.

All of these are hard for anyone to read, but given enough time to see these fast-moving objects, usually a person with healthy vision can "get" the gist of the information.

But people with slower brain processing speeds may not be able to "get" any of the signs or headlines. When Polat retrained the brain and the foveal part of the eye, he could measure improved vision. He said, "training adults to reduce foveal crowding leads to improved vision. A similar training conducted two years ago allowed adults to eliminate their use of reading glasses using a technology provided by the GlassesOff company.

"Other patients who had lost sharp vision for whatever reason were also able to benefit from the same training and improve their processing speed and visual capabilities," said Polat. ■

Culinary Bazaar a treat for foodies

SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In September 1892, the Jerusalem train station opened as the first and last stop of the Jerusalem-Jaffa line. It closed in 1998, and the station offices, ticket office and hall and its 3,000-square-metre concourse sat deserted until First Station was renovated and restored in May 2013.

Today it is a venue for numerous restaurants, a family bazaar, a design fair for 30 designers, a running shoes' store, an activity centre for children, and a visitors store. Plus there is a myriad of activities running seven days a week.

For those interested in food, a tour of the kosher Culinary Bazaar is a must. Nir Zook, the 37-year-old, Israeli-born chef, was our guide. Zook has worked in restaurants in Israel, France and the United States since the age of 13 and currently owns three restaurants in Jaffa – upscale, candlelit and romantic Cordelia; its little sister, Noa; and the Jaffa Bar.

When Avi Murdoch, partner in the management team and entrepreneur, created the idea of making the old train station a centre for culture and food, he approached Zook with the idea of a culinary bazaar to be located in what was once the storage room for goods being shipped to Tel Aviv.

On the outside patio is a seating area with clever stools made from used tires with grass-like seats; nearby is a hot, corn-on-the-cob container. A restaurant has recently opened opposite this area.

Next to the seating area is a bar with drinks for sale on one side and produce on the other as well as a candy bar with 27 different candies, nine spices and 28 dried fruit, nuts and snack varieties.

By the main entrance is the booth of Michal Havirian and her husband from Moshav Nocham (near Bet Shemesh, 15 miles from Jerusalem). The booth sells 50 to 60 different kinds of organic produce, freshly picked for only a day's sales. Kale, baby leeks, lettuces and other vegetables are sold in their natural state with their leaves attached. Particularly tasty was the raw corn on the cob and the Napoli pumpkin.

Inside the old building are 10 kiosks starting off with a booth where fresh falafel and hummus are sold.

Itzhik sells kosher cheeses, and 150 different kinds of wine from 30 wineries around Jerusalem plus one from the Golan. Itzhik also operates a cheese and olive stall in the Jerusalem produce market, Machaneh Yehudah.

Next is a shop that sells pots and pans imported from France and knives.

In the fish shop on the day we visited was sea bream, striped bass, red mullet and grouper – delivered twice a day – and imported salmon from Norway, delivered twice a week. Oriental condiments to go with the fish are also for sale. One can also find fisherman accessories and organize a fishing trip with Nir Elimelech.

Halvah, techinah and baklava are sold in the next shop; fresh pasta and pizza are nearby to eat there or take home.

Gruda's Bakery, made by Leon Gruda, pastry chef, has breads, cakes, tortes, cookies, quiches and croissants to eat here or take home or, as they say in Israel, "take away."

At Daskalide's, one can buy Belgian chocolate, one of the 30 varieties offered or boxes from 125 grams to one kilo. Chocolate chips, and all sizes of gift items and gift baskets are also available.

Tom runs the coffee shop, Cafe Barista, where beans are roasted. One can drink the house coffee, made from five different kinds of beans, or take home a bag of coffee.

For ice coffee enthusiasts, the beans are soaked in water for 24 hours then separated and the liquid strained. This is poured over crushed ice resulting in a wonderful tasting cold coffee.

The Culinary Bazaar is a fun experience day or night. Wandering through the bazaar is definitely an entertaining and enjoyable time one wants to repeat on a regular basis. ■

Israeli discovery could reverse Alzheimer's damage

DAVID SHAMAH
TIMES OF ISRAEL

Research by a Tel Aviv University team may point the way to protecting cells from the damage wrought by Alzheimer's disease, and even reverse damage that the disease caused before treatment. The method involves a protein similar to one which protects the brain from damage, but which is lacking in Alzheimer's patients.

What causes Alzheimer's is still a mystery, but the direct physical conditions leading to the dementia associated with the disease are very clear to scientists. Plaque accumulations and tangles in neurons kill brain cells in Alzheimer's sufferers, leading to the degeneration of cognitive function and the loss of memory associated with the disease.

One of the most important objectives of Alzheimer's research has been to figure out ways to protect brain cells from these senile plaques and neurofibrillary tangles. In a study published in the May 2014 edition of the Journal of Alzheimer's Disease, Tel Aviv University Prof. Illana Gozes describes how NAP, a snippet of a protein essential for brain formation, has been proven in previous studies to protect cognitive functioning. Loss of NAP exposes cells to physical damage that eventually destroys them, but applying proteins with NAP-like properties makes them healthy again.

It's just such a protein that Gozes and her team have discovered. The research, she said, could eventually lead to the development of drugs to treat Alzheimer's.

"Several years ago we discovered that NAP showed efficacy in Phase 2 clinical trials in mild cognitive impairment patients, a precursor to Alzheimer's," she said. "Now, we're investigating whether there are other novel NAP-like sequences in other proteins."

NAP has been shown to provide potent neuroprotection in several human trials. It is derived from activity-dependent neuroprotective protein (ADNP), a molecule that is essential for brain formation.

In tests on mice suffering from dementia-like characteristics, a tubulin fragment with NAP-like sequences was applied to cells with promising results, Gozes said. As NAP "evaporated," the brain cells were less protected and deteriorated. The tubulin treatment reversed the damage.

"We looked at the mouse 'dementia'-afflicted brain and saw there was a reduction in the NAP parent protein, but upon treatment with the tubulin fragment, the protein was restored to normal levels." "We clearly see here the protective effect of the treatment," she said. "We witnessed the restorative and protective effects of totally new protein fragments, derived from proteins critical to cell function, in tissue cultures and on animal models." ■

Kibbutzim are popular spots

"The Sunday market takes place weekly, rain or shine," says Shaun Deakin, a former kibbutz volunteer who now manages Kibbutz Dorot's gardens and landscaping projects. With the promise of safety and improved transportation comes new investment. New houses are springing up in almost every neighbourhood around Sderot's Sapir College, and students now find space and opportunity to live comfortably.

There is even a busy youth centre with a cinema where student films are shown. Negev kibbutzim are popular destinations in the summer for Israeli tourists. Many families travel together and rent out guesthouses to host parties.

Perhaps nowhere else in the country is the true Israeli experience and character more accessible to tourists. Sderot may not offer the same intensity of culture and history as Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, but it certainly has many charms of its own and should be a choice destination on tourists' itinerary. This is kibbutz country, a pioneering experiment and now an easy train ride from the rest of Israel's treasures. ■

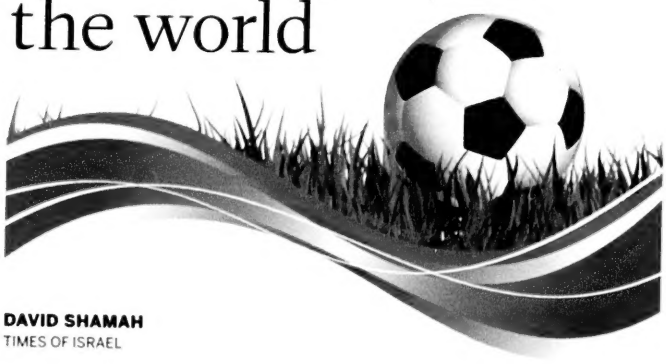
LiveU transmits World Cup around the world



DAVID SHAMAH
TIMES OF ISRAEL

LiveU, an Israeli startup, is gearing up to deliver television-quality video of World Cup coverage via cellular connections to broadcast centres and the Internet, using a network of 200 of the firm's mini-broadcast boxes, devices about half the size of a laptop.

Over 30 international broadcasters are scheduled to beam the games from stadiums in the 12 host cities across Brazil, where games will be held during the month-long quadrennial tournament.

LiveU will thus be responsible for ensuring that broadcasts of most of the games get out to the rest of the world. It's a heavy burden, but one LiveU CEO Samuel Wasserman believes the company can manage.

LiveU is headquartered in Kfar Saba, with a U.S. office in Hackensack, N.J. It was established in 2006 and is said to be the only company offering a remote uplink solution for broadcast-quality video without requiring a satellite or wired Internet connection.

The company has hundreds of clients in about 60 countries around the world, including Major League Baseball, the National Basketball Association and the National Football League. The BBC used LiveU devices for major events, such as the Queen's visit to Ireland in 2011 and the 2012 London Summer Olympics.

BBC news uses LiveU's technology for many of its field reports, said Wasserman, adding that the company was honoured at the BBC's "vote of confidence in the flexibility of our solution." About 50 people work for LiveU.

LiveU is currently the only company offering a robust transmission solution for broadcasters, consisting of up to 14 cellular modems over multiple carriers, as well as multiple LAN and even BGAN satellite connections (as backup). The solution works with any camera. The bonded modems (both 3G and 4G) aggregate all data connections simultaneously to achieve high bandwidth and smooth transmission, even as bandwidth and signal levels change across the different connections.

Some of the connections from some carriers may suffer from fluctuations and slowdowns when there is heavy traffic in the network, but LiveU's software is built to compensate by drawing on other resources to keep the uplink going at the best possible quality.

Until LiveU developed this solution, most broadcasters relied on satellite uplinks to deliver broadcasts. But satellite broadcasts require a line of sight connection to the satellite, said LiveU vice-president Ariel Galinsky, making it impractical for broadcasting from indoors, under bridges, inside caves or even in very cloudy weather. "Since LiveU uses the cell network, our device can broadcast from locations where satellite use is out of the question," he said, adding that the leased systems that LiveU provides clients are a lot cheaper for broadcasters than renting a satellite van or using a satellite phone, which "costs a lot of money per minute, with the hardware itself very expensive."

LiveU recently upgraded its broadcast boxes, making them smaller and adding

Internet transmission capability. The company's new DataBridge device allows users to download content from the Internet, edit it and transfer the file back to the cloud, where it can be downloaded for broadcast or viewed via a web site. The device can act as a Wi-Fi hotspot, allowing fans in the stadium, or elsewhere, to view the broadcast via their devices or on a website.

As a result, FIFA plans for the first time to broadcast live feeds of games on the Internet. LiveU is set to partner with TERRA, the largest Internet company in Latin America, to show full games and clips on subscription sites TERRA will administer. TERRA expects over 80 million people in Latin America and beyond to tune in to at least some of the action online.

According to Ronen Artman, LiveU's vice-president of marketing, "the FIFA World Cup is one of the pre-eminent sporting events on the global calendar, and 2014 is no exception. This is a tremendous opportunity for media companies, be that broadcast or online or a combination of the two, to show how dynamic they can be in what's a very competitive arena. LiveU technology is ideal for covering stories and sports news around the tournament." ■
